"The area of this yard is only about sixty acres, and most of it is already occupied by buildings. I have therefore estimated for the purchase of the whole of Seavey's Island adjacent to the yard. The purchase of this island will furnish an additional waterfront, and ample space for the erection of all the workshops and storehouses that will be required to make this a first-class yard. Besides, the bridge constructed across the water between Seavey's Island and the navy-yard, authorized by act of Congress, with the conditional free use of a way through the yard for the residents of the island, has caused an increase of inhabitants on the island, which will continue to enhance the value of the ground. This increase of population is a source of great inconvenience and embarrassment to the Government by the frequent use of the way through the yard and over the Government bridge to Kittery, so that I recommend the purchase of the whole island if it can be obtained on reasonable terms. In case such acquisition cannot be made on reasonable terms, I recommend the prohibition, as provided by said act of Congress, at the discretion of the Department, of travel of every kind from said island to and through the navy-yard."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] could not have been in his seat when I made my remarks, or he would have known that I read the whole of that, word for word.

Mr. ROLLINS. I am very glad the gentleman did so. If he read what I have now said, he must have proved to the House conclusively that the purchase of Seavey's Island is absolutely necessary for the wants of the Department. He intimates that this purchase is not desirable, because, forsooth, the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks desires to make this a first-class navy-yard. I believe that is the very best reason in the world why the purchase should be made. Evidence has been presented to this committee to-day which should satisfy them that the best interests of the Navy Department require that the Portsmouth navy-yard should be made a first-class yard.

The gentleman quotes the opinion of Admiral Smith to show that this purchase should not be made, and by that very quotation he proves clearly that it should be made. For the admiral says that if the purchase cannot be made for $105,000 the Government has a remedy; and what is that remedy? It is that we close up communication between the island and the main-land; that we stop the communication between Seavey's Island and the main-land at Kittery; and that would force the people on the island to sell it to the Government upon the terms the Government offers. That is what is proposed; and still the gentleman from Illinois quotes Admiral Smith as evidence that this purchase should not be made. And in that I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The time limited for general debate has expired.

Mr. RAYMOND. I move to amend by adding $5,000 to the appropriation. I do it for the purpose of saying what I can say, in the five minutes allowed under the order of the House, in favor of this appropriation. I hope the impression will not prevail in this committee that the Committee on Appropriations was one whit less anxious to practice economy and save money to the Government than any member who has spoken upon that subject upon this floor. It has been the effort of that committee, in every instance, to save money to the Government, and the reason why they reported this item in the bill was because, to the best of their judgment, after due examination, and after inquiry from all who could be presumed to know about this particular point, they came to the deliberate conclusion that, in the long run, money would be saved to the Government, and a very large amount, too, by making this appropriation.

It must be borne in mind, when the question of economy on the part of the committee is considered, that two items in the estimates of the Navy Department have been stricken out by the committee. One was an item of $125,000 called for by the Department for officers' quarters; the other an item of $25,000 required for the building of a quay-wall. This purchase of Seavey's Island would answer both purposes; by making it unnecessary to make these other appropriations. The committee acted on this principle, that where money was to be expended, it should so far as possible be expended for purposes that would be permanent and not temporary. Now, to build these officers' quarters would be to furnish but cramped and confined accommodations, and the building of a quay-wall would not give all the facilities needed; whereas the purchase of the island will answer both purposes, and be a permanent possession to the Government, and worth more than the sum proposed to be given for it.

And then in addition to that, which was the controlling reason, came in all the reasons which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has done us the favor to read from the document from which he has quoted. Those are simply additional reasons, besides that which influenced the committee. It was the opinion of the committee that the most economical thing for the Government would be to purchase this island, and strike out the other appropriations asked for, and which I have mentioned. Of course, the committee has no desire except to subserve the general interest of the Government and the country. They are all as anxious to promote economy as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] or my colleague from New York [Mr. CONKLIN] can be. I think if those gentlemen had devoted as much time to the investigation of the points involved in this subject as the committee has done, they would have less doubt about the propriety of this appropriation than they now seem to have.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise pro forma to oppose the amendment, in order that I may inquire of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] or any other member of the committee, why it is necessary now, at the beginning of a very important session of Congress, to establish the precedent of introducing into an appropriation bill an important item of original legislation. I am afraid of the precedent; and I want to inquire what makes it improper or impracticable to introduce a separate bill to provide for this object.

Mr. STEVENS. This is not original legislation. It should properly be classed with appropriations "for contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government;" and in this view it is strictly within the rule.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. RAYMOND. I withdraw the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, was adopted, there being, on a division—ayes 67, noes 40.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has ordered that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall now proceed to the consideration of the President's annual message, on which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DEMING] is entitled to the floor.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. DEMING. Mr. Chairman, I propose to submit some remarks to the committee pertinent to that paragraph of the President's message wherein he wisely refers to the House the question of the readmission of members from the insurrectionary district, and I submit them now because they will serve to vindicate votes upon questions of this nature which we have already passed upon when no opportunity for explanation was afforded, and because, also, they will vindicate the opinions which will guide me when similar cases shall hereafter be presented. I had hoped, in reply to the resolution offered by my colleague, [Mr. BRANDEGEE,] that we should have been furnished ere this with copies of the laws and ordinances which have recently been enacted by popular conventions and provisional legislatures in the enemy's country, that our judgments might have been enlightened upon the important part of reconstruction which has been graciously submitted to the wisdom of Congress.

In the absence, however, of such valuable aid, I must govern myself by the principles which have hitherto uniformly guided the executive department in administering the reclamations of its sword, and by such sifted and unimflammatory facts as the powers that be, with a considerate regard for the public health, permit to dribble out from official channels of intelligence.

If we had been engaged in a war with England for the last four years, the legal effect and liabilities of such a conflict upon the two parties would have been clear and unmistakable, for the legal relations of two nations belligerent to each other, as well as the legal relations of their respective inhabitants, are as fully and accurately defined by the law of nations as the relations of landlord and tenant or grantor and grantee are by the municipal law.

As respects the nations, a war instantly annuls the most solemn compacts and treaties, and destroys all the claims of one belligerent upon another, except those which may be sanctioned by a treaty of peace. As respects the citizens of the two nations, it instantly converts all of them into a state of enmity to each other in utter contempt even of their own animus or predilections; so that in the case supposed—a war with England—Cobden, were he alive, and John Bright and John Stuart Mill and Thomas Hughes, however much they might oppose the war, and however amicable they were to this country, would be, in the eye of the law, our enemies just as much as the cabinet ministers who advised it, and the generals, admirals, soldiers, and sailors who were carrying it on. The first blast of war would immediately render unlawful all intercourse, commercial or otherwise, between the people of the two countries. Contracts which were in existence at the commencement of the war would be suspended, and those entered into during its continuance void. The insurance of enemies' property, the drawing of bills of exchange or purchase on the enemy's country, the remission of bills or money to it would be illegal and null. Existing partnerships between the citizens and subjects would be dissolved, and all trade and intercourse, direct or indirect, would be completely and absolutely interdicted by the mere force and effect of the war itself. All the property of the people of the two countries on land and sea would be liable to confiscation and capture, with certain qualifications as to property on land, and all debts interchangeably due would be liable to forfeiture at the discretion of the respective Governments. (Judge Nelson in Prize case, 2 Black.)

Now, there is one fact which, in all the fog and bewilderment which surrounds present issues, looms out in prominent and startling relief. We have been for the last four years "in a state of war;" not, it is true, against any foreign nation, but against certain States which once owed allegiance to this Government and afterward confederated together for its destruction; and the existence of this "state of war," with a full knowledge of the legal meaning of that phrase, and of the legal consequences which attach to that state, has been repeatedly recognized both by the legitimate and revolutionary Governments, and by all their departments; by the two Executives, in levying and marshaling armies, and hurling them together with all the implements and agencies of destruction; by establishing a blockade and issuing letters of marque by virtue, and by virtue only, of a cessation of peaceful relations; by both Congresses in solemn and deliberate enactment tantamount to declarations of war, as by the act of the confederate congress, at Montgomery, of May 6, 1861, entitled "An act recognizing a state of war," as by the act of this Congress of July 13, 1861, generally known as the non-intercourse act; recognized by the full play and operation, with all their machinery for confiscation and forfeiture, of the courts of prize, in abeyance during peace and only liberated and set in motion by the inexorable necessities of war; recognized by foreign nations, which have conceded full belligerent rights to each party to the contest; recognized, finally, by the highest arbiters of conflict between the State and Federal authority known to our system, the Supreme Court of the United States, which, by the voice of all its judges, has unanimously declared that from the 13th day of July, 1861, "a civil territorial war has existed between the United States and the confederate States." And this war, the same august tribunal declares, commenced in no tumultuous and unorganized insurrection, but was organized by body-politics calling themselves States, claiming to be sovereign over all persons and property within their respective limits, and asserting a right to absolve their citizens from their allegiance to the Federal Government. As States they seized national forts, arsenals, custom-houses, navy-yards, post offices within their boundaries; as States they extinguished every pharos upon their coasts; as States they raised armies, levied taxes, loaned their credit, and issued bonds for supporting the war; as States they adopted a new constitution and confederated together into a hostile government, claiming to be sovereign and independent, and waged, to sustain the claim and secure its recognition by the world, a war so vast in its proportions, so terrible in its destruction of life, so appalling in its barbarities, so damnable in the monstrous horrors which it conceived and executed, that all the nations from "China to Peru" stand aghast, as crash after crash of such awful thunder reaches their affrighted ears. Now, how does this war, in such frightful terrors clad, and so notorious, organized by States claiming to be sovereign, and waged by those States united into a government claiming to be independent, differ from a foreign war in the belligerent rights which it bestows upon us and in the legal consequences which it entails upon our enemies? It differs but in one essential particular. A civil war, as absolutely as a war inter gentes, confers upon the parties to it full belligerent rights and the corresponding liabilities of a perfect war.

Need I, to substantiate this position, appeal to those great public jurists whose weighty maxims are the imperial rescripts to the international code? Need I summon here Grotius, himself a refugee from civil war, the founder of these imperishable statutes, which, as by an elemental force, hold warring nations from rushing madly from their spheres into the chaos and darkness of utter barbarism, to say—

"That a civil war between members of the same society is a mixed war, public on the side of the Government, but private on the part of the people resisting authority; yet such a war entitles both belligerent parties to full belligerent rights?"

Need I summon one to whom public law is scarcely less indebted, but who wrote a century later, that Vattel may reiterate with more precision that—

"A civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect: it produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge. Those two parties, therefore, must necessarily be considered as constituting, at least for a time, two distinct societies."

Need I appeal to Riquelme, who declares that—

"When a part of the State takes up arms against the Government, if it is sufficiently strong to resist its action and to constitute two parties of equally balanced forces, the existence of civil war is thenceforward determined. If the conspirators against the Government have not the means of assuming this position, their movement does not pass beyond rebellion. As true civil war breaks the bonds of society, by dividing it in fact into two independent societies, it is for this consideration that we treat of it in international law, since each party forming as it were a separate nation, both should be regarded as subject to the laws of war. This subjection to the law of nations is the more necessary in civil wars, since those, by nourishing more hatreds and resentments than foreign wars, require more the corrective of the law of nations in order to moderate their ravages."

Need I call upon Bello, who says:

"When a faction is formed in a State, which takes up arms against the sovereign, in order to wrest from him the supreme power, or impose conditions on him; or when a republic is divided into two parties which mutually treat each other as enemies, this war is called a civil war, which means war between fellow-citizens. Civil wars frequently commence by popular tumults which in nowise concern foreign nations; but when one faction or party obtains dominion over an extensive territory, gives laws to it, establishes a government in it, administers justice, and, in a word, exercises acts of sovereignty, it is a person in the law of nations; and the foreign Powers which desire to maintain their neutrality ought to consider both as two States, independent as respects one another and other States, and who recognize no judge of their differences."

Or, in order to define more precisely the great and pervading change which has been produced in the relation of the insurgent States and of all their citizens to this Government by the war which they have waged, need I quote the decision of the Supreme Court in the memorable prize cases, where, upon a point raised, it is expressly affirmed that all within the hostile territory "are public enemies and liable to be treated as such;" that the United States may exercise full belligerent rights, and that to the antagonist party all the legal liabilities and consequences of war necessarily attach; the sole element of distinction, according to the court, between the legal effects of a civil war and the legal effects of a foreign war, being, that in the former the party claiming to be sovereign may exercise full belligerent as well as sovereign rights? Or need I, finally, to corroborate this position, cite the uniform action of the executive department, which, since hostilities commenced, has pursued the enemy with invasion, blockades, armies, fleets, sequestration, conscription, military commission, courts-martial, by virtue of its claim to full belligerent rights; which has received from them flags of truce, granted to them paroles, passports, and safe-conducts, and negotiated terms for a general surrender in deference to their possession of belligerent rights; and which, since their military power has been broken, has ruled them by military governors, dictated conditions of permanent peace, superseded laws and municipal elections, suspended Governors elected by themselves, arrested the judgments of their local courts, and administered their local affairs in a thousand ways which would be utterly without justification unless it was abundantly justified by the laws of war, and without vindication under the Constitution unless it was abundantly vindicated by that construction of it for which I am here contending?

Now, if I am right in the position which I have assumed, that the "civil territorial war" in which we have been involved differs in none of its legal effects (except in the particular which I have indicated) from a foreign war, then we are able to define with precise accuracy the legal relation of the insurgent States and their citizens to this Government since they first appealed to wager of battle.

Up to the time their military power was broken by the universal surrender of their armies and the universal trailing of their unhonored flag, the States were hostile States, and their citizens "public enemies," with belligerent rights and belligerent rights only, entitled to claim no benefit from laws or Constitution, whether that Constitution be called a compact, a treaty, or a covenant, or whether the parties to it were States in their sovereign capacity, or the people of the United States as individuals. And since the surrender the legal relation both of the States and individuals has been that of vanquished enemies, with their lives, property, and political system absolutely at the mercy of the conqueror.

Having thus tried these States by the accredited maxims of public law for the purpose of ascertaining their precise legal relations to the Government they have conspired to destroy, I was intending here to apply to the insurgent eleven the touch-stone of the Constitution, and see what powers it confers upon States as States, what rights it secures to States as States, and what duties and obligations it enjoins as essential, inevitable, and necessary equivalents upon States as States, for the purpose of deducing the comforting conclusion that a State under the Constitution has no rights, and can exercise no power, which discharges no duty and spurns every obligation. But this proposition has been so ably discussed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLEBARGER] that I am willing to leave the dogma, that organized rebellions are States, just where he left it, sprawling and writhing under the blows of such a battle-axe as Cœur de Lion dropped on the head of the infidel.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. DEMING. I would inform the gentleman from Wisconsin that I have not so thoroughly got the hang of this school-house at present that I can consent to interruptions. As I am speaking without notes or brief, I tell him frankly that I cannot have my concatenation disturbed by interruptions. [Laughter.]

Although this is the theory which I have uniformly maintained here and elsewhere respecting the nature of this rebellion, and although I do not believe that these vanquished enemies and "organized rebellions" have any reason for claiming that mitigation of the extreme rights of war which are accorded by modern usage to those who think they are waging a just war, yet I deprecate and most emphatically disclaim any desire or purpose to apply to their case the strictissimum jus or rigid rule of international law.

But I do intend fairly, squarely, and firmly, to plant myself, in deciding the momentous issues before us, upon the milder interpretation of the rights of conquest, conceded now by every publicist and vindicated by all the wars of history, that we have the right, as victors, to impose any terms upon the vanquished which are necessary for the future security of the Republic and for enforcing and redeeming all the pledges of public faith which the Government has given as the price of victory. I shall insist that "organized rebellions," called by courtesy "States," shall not resume their former rights without irreversible guarantees to national security and national honor. I shall insist that we have the right, both as victors on the one hand and as legislators on the other, to exclude them from the Congress of the United States until the repetition of the secession experiment is placed beyond a peradventure; and no vote from any of these vanquished enemies shall, by my consent, endanger the public faith until that precious jewel is imbedded in the imperishable buttresses of the Constitution.

I am now prepared to declare with precision, but with brevity, what the national security and the public faith, in my judgment, require as conditions precedent to the readmission to the public councils of "public enemies" from States who for more than four years have deliberately divested themselves of every legal idea of a State as defined by public law, and of all the elements of a State which the Constitution of the United States enjoins them to possess and maintain.

It requires, first, that the Government shall be absolutely protected from a repetition of the secession experiment by a provision in our organic law; second, that the freedman shall be secured an absolute equality with the white man before the civil and criminal law, and shall be endowed with every political right necessary to maintain that equality; third, that the public creditor shall be protected, as completely as organic law can protect him, from any repudiation or scaling down of the public debt; fourth, that the citizens, both of the rebel and loyal States, shall be protected, as completely as organic law can protect them, from any taxation, direct or indirect, for the payment of the rebel debt; and unless the equality of the freedman before both civil and criminal law can be fortified by legislation here, under the second clause of the amendment to the Constitution, giving universal freedom to the slave, we shall require, fifth, an amendment similar to that introduced by my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,]

"That Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper to secure to all persons in every State equal protection in their rights of life, liberty, and property."

Much more than this we might rightfully demand; much more than this we might reasonably claim; but not a jot less can we fail to secure as conditions precedent to the readmission of these "public enemies" to the public councils without being guilty of treachery to the living, to the dead, and to those who are yet to be.

Having thus defined the relation of these insurgent States to the Government according to public law and according to the Constitution, I wish to address myself for a moment to the spirit, temper, animus of these "public enemies" at the present time, and to ask, what security have we that the indispensable prerequisites of national safety and national faith which I have enumerated would not be jeopardized by the presence here of the Representatives of those men, who, when the grass on these surrounding hills, which is now but just withered, was but just green, were pursuing us with the sword, with the fire-brand, with pestilence, massacre, and slow starvation, as on that wild and awful night in the kalends of April—but I forbear; the wedding follows so close upon the funeral that Might coldly furnish forth the marriage tables."

We are here, in the full gaze of the nation and the civilized world, charged with the future grandeur and renown of the Republic. We are here fairly coining and molding the rising eras and ages of a continent. We are here attempting to save an empire from being mortally wounded by that ball which has hardly yet spent its force, and which these new converts sped at its head when in their now regenerate bosoms burned all the concentrated flames of hell. We are here, having just rescued the Government from death on the field of honor, attempting to save it from the death of infamy which would follow its perfidy to the freedman who fought its battles and to the creditor who purchased its bonds. And when here, under such oppressive responsibilities to the present and the future, to the living and the dead, we ask, earnestly ask, like tortured Ajax begging for light, what proof—strong, convincing, overwhelming, as the enormous improbability of the supposition requires—do you present that these red-handed rebels can safely participate with us in launching the now enfranchised Republic on its dazzling orbit of justice, probity, and freedom, we are forthwith answered by a flux of glittering generalities, which are no more proofs of loyalty than the dogged submission of the assassin Payne to his fate was proof of loyalty. "They accept the situation;" so did Payne. They "submit to necessity;" so did Payne. "The aspect of affairs is more promising than could have been expected;" so it was in Payne's case—it was supposed he would kick and bite the executioner. "An abiding faith is entertained that their actions will conform to their professions;" that must be a faith like Tertullian's, who said, "Credo quia impossibile est."

I see by the northern papers that some reverend gentlemen have been transcendently weak enough to bless God "for having converted the southern heart to loyalty." If this be so, St. Paul's conversion was rather a tame affair. If it be true that these fire-eating, blood-thirsty southrons, whose untamed insubordination, whose furious and vindictive passions, were the proverb and shame of our past, have been suddenly born again, then has the day of Pentecost met with an eclipse which amounts to a total obscuration, and the epistles of Andrew have worked a greater miracle than the preaching of Peter.

Why, Mr. Chairman, we all know that hypocrisy is not one of the vices of southern character. There is no loyalty there which would support what I regard, or what the least exacting Union man should regard, as indispensable to the present and future safety of this imperiled nation. That most acute and patient observer of the southern animus, General Carl Schurz, commissioned by the President to examine this very question, in the condensed essence and summing up of his most valuable report says:

"The loyalty of the masses and most of the leaders of the southern people, consists in submission to necessity. There is, except in individual instances, an entire absence of that national spirit which forms the basis of true loyalty and patriotism."

"The emancipation of the slaves is submitted to only in so far as chattel slavery in the old form could not be kept up. But although the freedman is no longer considered the property of the individual master, he is considered the slave of society, and all independent State legislation will share the tendency to make him such. The ordinances abolishing slavery, passed by the conventions under the pressure of circumstances, will not be looked upon as barring the establishment of a new form of servitude."

This is the final exhibit of the keen observer deputed by the President to examine upon the spot the condition of the insurgent States.

Sir, their conversion consists in bowing their still stubborn necks to a power which they could no longer withstand, and the instrument of it was the sword of Ulysses. Their penitence consists in discovering that they have committed a blunder.

When the Administration of Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated two alternatives were before them. They could have staid here, fighting the Government from the inside as they had done for the last thirty years, and while warmed in its too gentle and forbearing bosom, marking it for slaughter and measuring it for the grave. They could have gone out and attempted an assault upon it from the outside. They chose the latter. They raised their bloody hands in rebellion; and had no sooner done so than they found themselves confronted with the most puissant military Power which the world has ever seen when begirt for war, and when it had summoned its children for battle.

They went down with their short-lived banner in the dust of humiliation and defeat. And if there is any truth in this introversion into the southern animus, which has been laid before the country, they are, like a wily and discomfited enemy, watching the chance to steal back and adopt the other alternative, and strangle the Government here in the very sanctuary of its power and majesty. "Oh doubter and gainsayer!" I hear some ardent friend of readmission ask, "have they not repealed the secession ordinances? Have they not adopted the amendment to the Constitution and repudiated the rebel debt?" Oh, yes, with a command of countenance and solemnity of visage which, under the circumstances, is truly marvelous. They have told all the beads, repeated all the aves, and pattered all the prayers enjoined upon them as a condition of absolution; but it is within the limits of possibility that they have done all this to purchase unlimited indulgence to sin; and not to be invidious in comparisons, I am told that Italian brigands are never so devout in kneelings, crossings, and paternosters; as when they are about to plunge afresh into crime.

They have ratified the amendment to the Constitution, have they? But how have they ratified it? With a construction and gloss upon it which is more trumpet-tongued proof of their perennial perfidy to the black race than all the hypocritical mouthings of acquiescence in emancipation which could be collected in six months' hunt from Richmond to the Rio Grande. They have ratified it with a construction that it merely abolishes the infamy of buying, selling, and owning human beings; and under the exceptional clause ("except as a punishment for crime") reconstructed North Carolina is now selling black men into slavery for petty larceny, and reconstructed South Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana are fettering the contract system with so many subtle formalities, forfeitures, and conditions, that a modern labor contract is much like an old-fashioned slave-pen—a trap to hold the freedman to his work and cheat him of his wages. It is also true that in equivocal and guarded language they have repealed the secession ordinance and repudiated the rebel debt. But who can have faith in a generation of vipers? The next Legislatures may reenact secession and reaffirm the debt, and I am determined for one to accept no bonds for their good behavior which they are at liberty either to cancel or steal. But the oaths! the oaths! They have sworn oaths to be faithful to the Constitution and to support the laws. Yes, my friend, they have piled Pelion upon Ossa in the shape of oaths; but, alas! they have taken all these oaths before, and on the top of them taken perjury upon their souls; and those who witnessed their perjured Senators and Representatives, their perjured officers, military, naval, and civil, their perjured judges, and their perjured curs of low degree, rushing from the Bible which they had kissed to the rebel congress and the confederate camp, will require more irreversible guarantees from the returning prodigals than those which end with "so help me God!" Confidence is said to be a plant of slow growth, and if there is any kind of confidence which should be longer than the American aloe in blossoming, it is confidence in any oath which these convicted oath-breakers can take.

I have pursued this investigation thus far into the animus of the inhabitants of the disfranchised States by the intuitions of common sense, with the expectation that this process would guide us at least to the conclusion that the burden of proof in this case rests most signally upon those who claim that they are ripe for our embrace and for the immediate readmission of their Representatives to this floor. I was intending next to adopt a more systematic method of investigation with the hope of showing that the intuitions of common sense and the process of inductive investigation mutually fortify and vindicate the same general conclusions. I was intending to examine the southern animus as evinced, first, by their general, local, and municipal elections; second, by the laws and ordinances which they have passed respecting the freedmen; third, by the testimony of the special agent appointed by the President to investigate their loyalty; fourth, by correspondence from the infected region; and fifth, by the statements of loyal citizens from the renovated States; and I affirm that from all these distinct and independent sources of information the evidence is complete and overwhelming that southern loyalty consists in submission to necessity, and that their implacable animosity to the Federal Government, and to those great measures which have been inaugurated for liberating and enfranchising the slave, is merely biding the time when, by the return to these Halls of its full complement of Senators and Representatives, the misfortunes of the field may be redeemed in the forum. But as the whole body of laws and ordinances have not yet reached us, the materials for an exhaustive examination are not yet complete, and I must defer to some future period of the debate the results of such an investigation. I can assure gentlemen that when the results of such an investigation are brought to the intelligence and conscience of the North, no man can live who votes for the unconditional admission of these unregenerate and implacable foes to any participation in our legislation here. I am thankful that my feeble voice has been permitted at this early day to sound the alarm.

I have thus, Mr. Chairman, defined my view of the relation of these insurgent States, as determined by public law and by the Constitution, to this Government. I have indicated without vindicating the constitutional muniments which will be required to defend the cause we have won when "public enemies" shall be joined with us in executing our sacred trust. In doing this I have stated some of the principles which will govern me in this momentous crisis of my country's history. Guided by them, I shall enter the dark and portentous cloud which is still lowering before us without fear, with great hope, but with no certainty. Upon the God of nations and the invincible strength of northern freemen we must still rely to make our deliverance sure.

Mr. SMITH (whose remarks will be published in the Appendix) next addressed the committee. He had not concluded his remarks, when, at the expiration of an hour,

The hammer fell.

Mr. DAWSON obtained the floor.

Mr. BAKER. I move that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] have permission to proceed until he concludes what he has to say. No objection was made.

Mr. SMITH. I do not expect to trespass on the attention of the House again this session. I really did not intend to speak so long as I have to-day. But if the House will indulge me by adjourning now, and permitting me to conclude my remarks on Monday, I shall be very much obliged, and will be able, I am certain, to finish then in about thirty minutes all I have to say. It must be evident from my voice that I am not in a condition to proceed now.

Mr. DAWSON. I will move that the committee now rise, with a view to allow the member from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] an opportunity to conclude his remarks on Monday, and with the understanding that I am entitled to the floor when he shall have concluded.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration House bill No. 122, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1867, and also the President's annual message, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

FRANCIS A. GIBBONS AND F. X. KELLEY.

Mr. McKEE. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take from the Private Calendar a joint resolution reported from the Committee of Claims, referring back to the Court of Claims for a rehearing the case of Francis A. Gibbons and F. X. Kelley, on an amended petition. No objection was made.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

REGISTRY OF VESSELS.

Mr. LYNCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to further regulate the registry of vessels; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CYRUS A. ANTHONY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Cyrus A. Anthony; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

SANITARY CONDITION OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire what measures are necessary and practicable to be taken by Congress for the purpose of improving the sanitary condition of the city of Washington in view of the possible appearance of the Asiatic cholera with the approach of the warm season, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

And then, on motion of Mr. DEFREES, the House (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned to Monday next.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 20, 1866.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of SAMUEL J. KIRKWOOD, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Iowa a Senator from that State for the unexpired term of Hon. James Harlan, ending March 3, 1867; which were ordered to be filed.

He also presented the credentials of Hon. JAMES HARLAN, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Iowa a Senator from the State of Iowa for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1867; which were ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of engineers of the United States revenue marine service, praying for an increase of their compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred memorials of citizens of Michigan, remonstrating against the renewal of the so-called reciprocity treaty with the British Provinces, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred petitions of John Pridgeon, William K. Muir, and John A. Sloan, praying for the issuance of American registers to the steam-tugs Michigan and Dispatch, reported a bill (S. No. 89) to issue American registers to the steam-vessels Michigan and Dispatch; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

BURLINGTON AND MISSOURI RIVER ROAD.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution No. 20, reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) extending the time for the completion of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad was read a second time by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in case the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company shall complete the section of twenty miles from the present terminus of its road by the 1st of October, 1866, and the certificate of the Governor of Iowa shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior of such completion, the company shall be entitled to its lands, as provided in section eight of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State,'" and its rights shall be in all respects the same as if the section should have been completed on the 1st of July next.

Mr. GRIMES. Under the grant of lands made to the State for the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company it was required to complete this section of twenty miles by the 1st of July next. This joint resolution is simply intended to extend that time from July until October.

Since the resolution was introduced and reported by the committee, I have intelligence that that country has been visited by a tremendous freshet, and that the bridge which was the cause of the delay in completing the road, and the condition of which compelled the company to apply for this extension of three months, has been swept away. I therefore propose to amend the resolution as reported by the committee by striking out the word "October" in the fifth line and substituting "December," so as to give them two months longer. The people are anxious that the road shall be completed as speedily as possible; but I think the company is entitled to a little leniency because of this act of Providence that has swept their abutments and bridge away.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the time ought to be extended for a year. The company have already had one or two misfortunes, and may have another. Extending the time two months in a great enterprise like a railroad is very little. I suggest that the time should be extended for a year, so as to allow sufficient opportunity for the purpose.

Mr. GRIMES. I am representing the people in that vicinity, who are extremely interested in having this road completed as speedily as possible, while I am attempting to protect the rights of the railroad company. I think from the intelligence I get that the injury which has resulted to the company can be made good in two months. I prefer, therefore, to have my amendment adopted.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to it if the Senator thinks the time he proposes sufficient.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday, being the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. When this bill was under consideration yesterday morning it was thought best by some Senators that we should fix by legislation the compensation to be paid to these pension agents. I find by an examination of the laws that that compensation has already been fixed by legislation. The history of the legislation on the subject, in brief, is this: upon the passage of the first pension act, it was made the duty of the War Department to appoint agents for the payment of pensions without any compensation. The agents were appointed at the discretion of the Secretary of War. It was then thought that the use of the deposits would pay for any expense or trouble in disbursing the money, and for many years the officers of banks made the payments. In 1847, for the first time, a law was passed fixing the compensation of pension agents at $1,000 per annum, and subsequently the same discretion was given to the Secretary of the Interior as to the appointments that had been lodged in the Secretary of War when the Pension Bureau was in the War Department. Another act or resolution, approved July 17, 1862, extended the maximum of compensation to $2,000. Another act, approved June 30, 1864, allowed to every pension agent disbursing $50,000 annually, $500 for clerk hire, rent of office, and office expenses, and $750 to every agent disbursing $100,000 annually, and $250 in addition for every additional $50,000, the maximum to the agent in no case to exceed $4,000. The opinion of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions is, that the present laws restricting the amount of compensation to these agents are amply sufficient, and that they are just about right. The maximum runs now from $2,000 to $4,000, including clerk hire and office rent. There is, therefore, no need for any amendment of the bill on that subject, it already having been secured by legislation.

There is one other point upon which an amendment was suggested yesterday, to limit the number of these appointments. It is the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions that it is impracticable to make any restriction at present, for this reason: there are four States now having three pension agents each, the States of Iowa, Indiana, Ohio, and New York; they are the only ones having as many as three; the most of the others have two, and some of the States have but one. These are thought now to be amply sufficient to answer all purposes. If we were to adopt the amendment suggested yesterday, saying that no State shall be entitled to more than three agents, every State now having but one or two would at once insist upon having the full complement. It is the opinion of the Department that such an amendment would make it almost indispensably necessary, under the pressure that would be brought to bear, to appoint three agents for each State. We do not propose a limit less than three, because if we do it will come off from every State that has now three agents. If, therefore, we should adopt an amendment providing that no more than three pension agents shall be appointed for each State, instead of restricting the number we should be authorizing twenty or thirty additional appointments, for each State would insist upon having three agents. For this reason, it is thought best to leave the bill precisely as it is, the restrictions on disbursements having been sufficiently provided for by previous laws.

I will state to the Senate that the reason why the laws fixing the compensation of pension agents were not found yesterday and were not accessible so that we might refer to them, was that they have been added to appropriation bills, and where they were precisely no one could inform us, but they seem to be complete in their character.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Pensions will not press a vote on this bill to-day. I desire to ask him whether his attention has been called to the amount paid the pension agents. He will find that it is a very large sum, and he will find also that every dollar paid to them can be saved by selecting as paying agents our national banks; and I propose, if he will not press a vote on the bill to-day, to bring in a substitute providing that the national banks shall be used as our agents to pay pensions instead of the present system.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. My attention has been called to precisely the subject to which the Senator from Kansas now refers, and I have been very unfortunate in my remarks if I have not satisfied the Senate and himself that the amount paid to every one of these agents is fixed by law and cannot be exceeded. The second section of the act fixing the compensation of pension agents, approved February 20, 1847, which was the first law on the subject, allowed for distribution a compensation not exceeding $1,000. When the business of the pension agents was greatly increased, growing out of the rebellion, a joint resolution was passed on the 17th of July, 1862, extending the maximum of commissions to $2,000; and another act, approved June 30, 1864, granted an allowance to pension agents, disbursing $50,000 annually, of $500 for clerk hire and office rent; and to those disbursing $100,000 annually, $750, and $250 in addition for every additional $50,000 disbursed, the whole compensation in no event to exceed $4,000.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. What is the whole amount paid to pension agents?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. There are forty-nine pension agents employed. Their maximum compensation cannot exceed $4,000 in any case, and it is fixed at $2,000, except where they pay out over $100,000, and then for each $50,000 above that sum there is an additional percentage reaching to $4,000.

As to the idea of employing the national banks to disburse this immense sum, I think it altogether impracticable. We have now forty-nine agents, every one of whom is vouched for as a faithful and honest man, every one of whom has entered into abundant and sufficient securities, and I think it is best to leave the disbursements precisely where they are now left by law. I have had free conference with the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions on this subject, neither of whom has intimated any such idea as changing the manner of payment from agents to the national banks.

I hope the bill will be disposed of this morning. It has been three several times before the Senate, and I think it is now as fully understood as it ever will be, and if it is to be postponed I shall take it as an indication that the Senate desire the enactment of no such law, and, for one, I shall not press it upon their attention any further.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The original plan was to use banks as agents to pay these pensions free of cost to the Government. The question I submitted to the chairman of the Pension Committee was—and I certainly did not mean to offend him in regard to his own bill—whether he had had any correspondence with the national banks as to their willingness to accept this agency free of expense to the Government. I am satisfied that, because of the length of time that these deposits would necessarily remain in the national banks, they would gladly accept the agency free of cost to the Government. I hope, therefore, that a vote will not be taken to-day upon this bill, and that I may have the opportunity of bringing in a substitute for it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. In answer to the last suggestion, that the use of the deposits in the national banks would be a sufficient compensation to induce them to make these disbursements, I have only to say that I made that point with the Commissioner of Pensions. He told me that under the first pension law it was the custom of the Department to place these deposits, at the beginning of the year, in the hands of the disbursing agents, and the use of the fund was sufficient to pay for the disbursements, but under our present system the pension agents make requisition for money when they need it, and it does not lie in their hands ten days. That is what I understand to be the difference.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. So far as Kansas is concerned, I know that the chairman of the committee is mistaken. Our fund is about $56,000, and the money is deposited by the agent in one of our banks, and I know that that bank would willingly accept the payment of the money for the use of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask my colleague one question. My impression of the law is that the Secretary of the Interior can now appoint as many pension agents as in his judgment are necessary. If so, this bill in regard to the number of agencies to be established does not change the law. It simply submits their appointment to the judgment of the Senate. There surely can be no objection to that. I will not, for one, consent to send pension claimants to any bank to get their money. Pension agents help them very much in making up their papers. If there is anything wrong about them, they fix them up. I think the present system is much more desirable.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. My colleague is precisely right. The Secretary now has exactly the discretion which this bill proposes to give the President.

Mr. HENDRICKS. So I thought.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like, if the Senate please, very much to take up the pension appropriation bill. It has been reported for some time. I think it will pass without any sort of debate. There are a few amendments which will require that it be sent back to the House of Representatives, and there is time enough in the morning hour to dispose of it, I think. It is House bill No. 36. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 36) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The appropriations proposed by the bill are:

For invalid pensions under various acts, $5,500,000
For revolutionary pensions, and pensions of widows, children, mothers, and sisters of soldiers, per act of March 18, 1818; May 15, 1828; June 7, 1832; July 4, 1836; July 7, 1838; March 3, 1843; June 17, 1844; February 2, July 21 and July 29, 1848; February 3, 1853; June 3, 1858; and July 14, 1862, $9,800,000.
For Navy pensions to widows, children, mothers, and sisters, per act of August 11, 1848, and July 14, 1862, $140,000.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was in line ten, after the word "soldiers," to strike out "per act" and insert "as provided for by acts;" so as to read:

For revolutionary pensions, and pensions of widows, children, mothers, and sisters of soldiers, as provided for by acts of March 18, 1818, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty, after the word "1862," to insert "and for compensation to pension agents and expenses of agencies," so as to include these expenses in the appropriation of $9,800,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-four, to strike out "per act" and insert "as provided for by acts."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the bill as a new section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sum be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:

For revolutionary pensions, and pensions of widows, children, mothers, and sisters of soldiers, as provided for by acts of March 18, 1818; May 15, 1828; June 7, 1832; July 4, 1836; July 7, 1838; March 3, 1843; June 7, 1844; February 2, July 21, and July 29, 1848; February 3, 1853; June 3, 1858, and July 4, 1862, $2,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Among the amendments agreed upon by the committee was one to insert at the end of the twenty-seventh line the words "to be paid out of the Navy pension fund." By some mistake that was either not reported or not printed. I move to amend by adding these words at the end of the twenty-seventh line, "to be paid out of the Navy pension fund." There is a fund of nine or ten millions, I understand, out of which the naval pensions should properly be paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended by adding the words "and additional appropriations for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CHANDLER. I notice in the reports of the Associated Press the other day that "Mr. CHANDLER gave notice that he would read the British foreign enlistment act." He gave no such notice. He gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce a bill containing the British foreign enlistment act with a clause repealing our present neutrality laws. If that notice is not so entered upon the Journal, I desire that it may be so recorded. My object was that there might be a uniform rule of neutrality as applicable both to the United States and to Great Britain, and by the enactment of their foreign enlistment act and the repeal of our neutrality laws, the whole question of neutrality would be understood both by Great Britain and by the United States.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to call up Senate bill No. 74, for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union, for the purpose of moving to make it the special order for Wednesday next.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I now move that the bill be postponed until Wednesday next, at one o'clock, and that it be made the special order for that day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to repeat a remark that I have made in preceding Congresses, that I really hope the Senate will be a little careful how, at the suggestion of gentlemen who may happen to have charge of particular bills, they make special appointments. We lumber up our order of business regularly every year by making special assignments of bills.

Mr. STEWART. If the bill can be considered a few moments now, I will withdraw my motion and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that will not be done, for I have not examined the bill, and I have an amendment to move to it which I have not yet prepared.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I really hope that unless it is some bill of pressing importance, gentlemen will not endeavor to have special assignments. One overlaps the other, and we get into infinite difficulty and confusion in the order of business; and unless some very special reasons are given for taking up a bill at a particular time, I really hope the Senate will not set the example. If the Senator had been here as long as I have been, he would be aware of the trouble, confusion, and difficulty arising from these special assignments of particular bills. He can give notice that he will call up the bill at a particular day.

Mr. STEWART. That will serve my purpose. Several Senators desire to look into this bill, and wish to know when it will come up. Not wishing to take them by surprise, I give notice now that I will call it up on Tuesday next.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator withdraws his motion.

Mr. SUMNER. Had the Senator better not say Wednesday?

Mr. STEWART. I will say Wednesday. I will let it stand until Wednesday, and I give notice that I shall call it up then.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be laid aside.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday. It is not quite one o'clock; but if we get engaged in some other bill, very likely we shall not get through with it by that time.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HENDRICKS to strike out in the fifth and sixth lines of the first section the words "shall continue in force until otherwise provided by law and."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COWAN. I would suggest an amendment in the seventh line of the first section. The bill as it at present stands reads in this wise: that the operations of this bureau and its jurisdiction "shall extend to refugees and freedmen in all parts of the United States." I propose to amend that by inserting after the word "all" the word "such," and after "United States" the words "as have lately been in rebellion."

I have no idea of having this system extended over Pennsylvania. I think that as to the freedmen who make their appearance there, she will be able to take care of them and provide as well for them as any bureau which can be created here. I wish to confine the operation of this institution to the States which have been lately in rebellion. I therefore move this amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Pennsylvania will see that the effect of that would be to exclude from the operation of the bureau the State of Kentucky and the State of Delaware, where the slaves have been emancipated by the constitutional amendment. The operation of the bureau will undoubtedly be chiefly confined to the States where slavery existed; but it is a fact which may not be known to the Senator from Pennsylvania, that during this war large numbers of slaves have fled to the northern States bordering on slaveholding territory. They congregated in very large numbers at Cairo; a good many of them upon the southern borders of Indiana, and some in Ohio. The people of those States are very unwilling to provide for and take care of these persons who come there without any means at all, and it is necessary for somebody to look after them. The Freedmen's Bureau, I think, has already sent some of its agents to these points, and has made some disposition of them by procuring them employment, or shipping them to other places, to relieve the communities where they were from the expense of maintaining them. It is with that view that the bill is made to extend throughout the country.

It is not supposed that the bill will have any effect in the State of Pennsylvania or in the State of Illinois, unless it might, perhaps, be at Cairo, where there has been a large number of these refugees congregated without any means of support; they followed the Army there at different times. And the same thing is true in Indiana to some extent; and in Ohio. I do not know that there can be any objection to the Freedmen's Bureau, which is organized with a view of looking after the interests of these people, sending one of its agents there to aid them in getting into positions where they can become self-sustaining. The provision of the bill in regard to holding courts, and some other provisions, are confined entirely to the rebellious States, and will have no operation in any State which was not in insurrection against this Government. I make this explanation to the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I think he will see the necessity of the bureau going into Kentucky and some of the other States, as much as into any of the southern rebellious States.

Mr. COWAN. That may all be: I have not had an opportunity to examine the bill exactly in all its details. If it was only to operate for the relief of the refugees, of course I suppose there could be no valid objection to it; but the operation of the original bill and this supplement is much wider, and really intends to introduce an imperium in imperio. It carries with it not only the power to relieve the refugee, but also a police power which in my State would be exceedingly objectionable; and that the mere fact should be recognized for one instant that it was to operate there, or might by any possibility operate there, would be exceedingly mischievous, and I am unwilling upon this floor, and feel it utterly inconsistent with my duty to my State, to allow any such thing to pass here. Where the necessity for this institution exists, let it be confined there, but let it not be extended beyond. If there are any portions of the States which have not been in rebellion where this jurisdiction is necessary, they should be accurately defined, because this is an extraordinary jurisdiction, and one which trenches upon those peculiar and acknowledged State rights which are estimated very highly by all of us everywhere—one which ought not to be extended beyond the limits of that necessity which begets its existence.

I do not see any better form in which to put the amendment than the one in which I have couched it; that is, where a State has been in rebellion, let this extraordinary remedy be applied; where a State has not been in rebellion, but has remained loyal to the Union and loyal to her allegiance to it, it is most extraordinary that this exterior or outside jurisdiction should be introduced for any purpose at all. It is a reflection on those States that they will not do justice to those who seek a refuge within their borders, and I repel, and desire to repel, any imputation of that kind from the State in which I reside. I am proud to say that, no matter who comes there, no matter what may be his color, his complexion, or his creed, he is there protected upon the same footing precisely as all her people are; and I may say, sir, that in her courts the negro obtains perhaps a fuller and more ample share of justice, on account of his weakness, than he would do were he a white man. Certainly nobody has ever complained that a full and exact measure of justice has not been meted out to him there in all our courts. I am loth, therefore, that anything of this kind should be enacted into a law by this Congress. If the bill in its provisions was made to operate where the necessity, or the alleged necessity, for it is said to exist, of course I have no objection; but I do object to extending it to the loyal States of the North.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, I should like to know the peculiar reasons why this bill is to be extended to the State of Kentucky. She has never been in rebellion. Though she has been overrun by rebel armies, and her fields laid waste, she has always had her full quota in the Union armies, and the blood of her sons has marked the fields whereon they have fought. Kentucky does not want and does not ask this relief. The freedmen in Kentucky are a part of our population; and where the old and lame and halt and blind and infants require care and attention they obtain it from the counties. Our whole organization for the support of the poor, through the agencies of the magistrates in the several counties, is complete.

Sir, I did hope that ere this we should have admitted the representatives of the ten States in the South who have organized governments, who are legislating for and taking care of their local concerns, and that we should have allowed them to take care of the freedmen in their respective States. They can do it far cheaper than we can. It is said that there are three million five hundred thousand blacks in the South who have been freed by the amendment of the Constitution and your previous action. If there be that many, there cannot be less than five hundred thousand, or one in seven, who will require the aid and support of the respective States, because they are not in a condition to support themselves, even if they were able and willing to work. The expense of supporting such a population at the lowest calculation would be fifty dollars a head, or $25,000,000 in addition to the expenditure provided for in the bill, which it was shown yesterday amounted to about twelve million dollars a year; and then the result of it will simply be to encourage the negroes to look to the Government for rations and keep them from working. It is providing for a lazzaroni throughout the States to which you apply it. I do not want it applied to Kentucky. We prefer to take care of our own poor, even of the African race. We have always treated them well. I have asked a very able lawyer with whom I have corresponded to give me a statement of the rights of freedmen in Kentucky under our laws as they stand—and they have not been changed in this respect since the constitutional amendment—and he says:

"At present there are but few differences in civil right between free negroes and whites. In all the rights of marriage, person, and property, they are identical. The same laws govern their marriages, their wills, their acquisitions of all kinds of property, and their disposition and transmission of it, their rights of suing on contracts for injuries to person and property, and their mode of trial in penal and criminal prosecutions. By those laws, freedmen, that is the whole negro or colored population, are now governed."

They have all these rights—the right to sue and be sued, the right to contract and be contracted with, the same right to purchase and hold property and transmit it by will or descent, the same rights of marriage, as white people. There is some little modification in the existing laws which our friends in the Legislature are endeavoring to procure; but generally the free negroes have the same rights of person and property as white persons.

I do not understand the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery as some gentlemen do. I believe its effect is to work the complete freedom of every individual, and to break down every provision in the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the several States which prevents the enjoyment of that freedom. In Kentucky, those who were formerly slaves are now free. They have the same rights that any other freedmen have there, and my word for it, Kentucky will make it all right, because she has been among the most liberal States in granting rights and privileges to her freedmen.

We have had the benefit of the Freedmen's Bureau in Kentucky, although we were not included in the provisions of the law creating the bureau. It seems we are entitled to the benefit of the invasion of the enemy, because they undertook to conquer Kentucky, as they intended to conquer Missouri, as part of the southern domain. They sent their armies there for the purpose, and after we had driven them back the deserters from both armies united and ravaged Kentucky by a guerrilla warfare that was exceedingly onerous to the people and very destructive to our interests. Is it because Kentucky has stood by the Union during the strife, is it because she has been desolated as she has been in this contest, that the Freedmen's Bureau is to be extended to her? It cannot be proposed as a measure of economy. The great measure of economy would have been to admit the States, and let each State take care of its own population. It must come to that, or this is a despotism for all time to come. We cannot have two systems of laws operating in one community, one portion of them governed by Congress and the other by the State Legislature.

There was a time when I looked upon the Constitution of the United States as the wisest system of government that had ever been devised in the history of time. Looking at it, I saw that thirteen States, each with a local government, had made a national Government by divesting themselves of certain powers and giving them to that national Government and making its laws the supreme law of the land over the constitutions and laws of the States; and a Government thus devised ought to endure forever. Under the system any legislation of Congress or a State in violation of the provisions of the Federal Constitution was void, and time and time again before the judicial tribunal of the Government, the United States Supreme Court, laws of Congress have fallen as void, and so have enactments of the States. It was a system to preserve itself in purity and perpetuity by conforming to its provisions. Any attempt of the State at insurrection was a violation of the Constitution.

I shall not attempt to go over the ground which was so ably argued by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] or the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH]. It is a plain, constitutional principle that every act of legislation and everything done in violation of the Constitution of the United States is void. We have a right to suppress insurrection. If there is a combination of States against the Union, that combination is void as in violation of the Constitution. When we suppress a rebellion we have not conquered the States, but we have conquered the rebellion. We have brought the States back into the Union, and it is not in the power of Congress, with all its legislative authority, with all the stretch of power made during the war under extraordinary circumstances—it is not in the power of Congress without violating the Constitution to exclude the States, and such an act would be held void by any judicial tribunal imbued with the principles of the Constitution and understanding its provisions.

Therefore, when the rebellion was suppressed, when the foe laid down their arms, the States were still States of the Union, but without organized State governments. It was the duty of the President—a duty with which he was charged and which he was solemnly sworn to execute—to preserve the Government. The Constitution makes it his duty to see that the laws are executed. The Constitution of the United States, the laws made in pursuance of it, and the treaties made under its authority, are the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. It was the duty of the President to treat all State laws or acts of State conventions or combinations of States in resistance to the just authority of the Government as null and void under the Constitution. It is made his business to see that the laws be executed. It was his duty to encourage these people to come back into the Union. I think it was in the perfect line of his duty, either as Commander-in-Chief or as chief executive officer of the United States, to bring them back. I do not think he had any authority to command them to do this thing, or to do that, but it was his duty to advise them, and I do not quarrel with him because he advised them to accept the results of the war, for from the feelings I see here manifested, when what they have done according to his advice is not sufficient, if they had not done what they have, God knows what organization would have been proposed for them and what armies we should have sent out against them.

I do not understand gentlemen when they say that the war continues. For more than nine months there has not been a soldier in the field against us. During that period of time there has been no organization in hostility to the Government, and there has been no one inciting to treason or raising troops to resist the United States. The President, in May last, issued his proclamation of amnesty. What did he do? Nations do not war against women and children, the old and the imbecile. It was impossible to prosecute for treason the whole population of the southern States. In his amnesty proclamation the President remitted the personal penalties arising from treason and the confiscation of property. To whom does the President extend this amnesty? He made certain exceptions, the extent of which is variously estimated; but no sensible man who has looked at the subject that I have talked with ever considered the exceptions in the amnesty proclamation as extending to more than forty thousand persons, and the larger portion of them come under the $20,000 clause. We know, as a matter of fact, that a large portion of the $20,000 exceptions are infants and widows and married women, and that but a very small portion of the active male population is affected by that exception. The President has granted some pardons, very much, as I gather from the tone and remarks here, to the dissatisfaction of many Senators on this floor. For myself, I am only sorry that he did not go further. There are now probably thirty-five thousand people within the United States excluded from the general pardon; and the war which gentlemen are contriving to carry on for the next five or ten years—God only knows when it is to stop—is against these thirty-five thousand people. All the rest are pardoned, freed from the stain of rebellion and the chances of confiscation.

When I came here I was in hopes, from what I had seen of the manifestations of public sentiment, that these States would be at once restored to the Union and admitted to participation in our councils, so that we might have the aid and advantage of their experience. What would have been the result? After admitting them we should then have asked the President to extend his amnesty, and to give back to women and children their estates, so that we might derive the revenue which would be the result of setting the southern people at work, and enabling them to make the South productive as it had heretofore been. Does any one suppose that all the property thus tied up, the owners of which are left uncertain as to what to do, will be ultimately confiscated by the United States? If we were ever so violent and ever so determined upon confiscation, public sentiment would not allow us to confiscate the property of women and children who were unable to engage themselves in rebellion, although they may have been worth more than $20,000. It may be thought that there are some who still cry for blood, but I trust there is no such sentiment as that.

Now, I ask Senators to consider the punishment the South have already felt. Ten thousand million dollars of their property have been destroyed and sunk in this rebellion. You may say they deserve it for having commenced the war. I say they deserve the consequence of engaging in an attempt to overturn this Government, and they must bear it, and they ought to bear it. If the object is the infliction of punishment, have we not fined them heavily enough when we have gone to the extent of $10,000,000,000? Have we not by this very act thrown upon them the support of a population who are not able to support themselves? It belongs to these State governments to take care of their own poor and those within their own borders.

Sir, it was not my intention to engage in this discussion. I believed when I came here that public sentiment was ripe for a restoration of the Union. I believed the arguments of Sherman and Grant, and other distinguished soldiers who had enforced the national authority upon the battle-field, afforded a greater security than you could possibly exact in any shape in which you might put it, and it is a lesson that will last as long as time shall endure, not only with them but with their posterity and for all future time. It is a decision that wants no confirmation by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a decision of the God of battles.

You may say that the result is humiliating to the South, that they are not prepared to love the hand that has chastised them; but do you think they will never make good citizens? Sir, for one, I would trust that brave and gallant people—I hope gentlemen will not consider it treason to call them so—who, with inferior numbers and inferior resources, made so stout and brave a contest against us, with all our strength, with all our money, and with all our vast resources. Like our gallant generals, when the battle is over I would extend to them the courtesy of gentlemen and the humanity to which I believe they are entitled. I want no other guarantee than that of which I have spoken; and I have yet to learn that any portion of the people of the United States who have considered the subject want them back in the Union curtailed of their powers and privileges; nor do I believe that the sober intelligence of this nation requires that we should send the officers of the bureau into the southern States to irritate and annoy the people there, by acting as agents for the colored population, instituting suits for them, and trying little petty difficulties between them and the white population. All the suits to be instituted under this bill are to be those in which justice shall be administered in favor of the blacks; and there is not a solitary provision in it relative to suits in cases where the blacks do wrong to the whites.

I hope that the provisions of this bill will not be extended to the State of Kentucky. This whole subject has given us a great deal of trouble. It has given us some trouble in the Legislature to adapt ourselves to the new condition of things in which we find ourselves. I tell you, gentlemen, the heart of Kentucky is right, and it will do right on this subject. We intend to provide for the support of the helpless people within our borders. We want no interference from the General Government on such a matter. There is no necessity for it. It is not in the bond of the Union that you shall send your officers and agents to Kentucky to judge between portions of her population. I ask you, gentlemen, to bring this question home to yourselves. I am sure if chance were ever to put the party to which I belong in power, we would not hold this chalice to your lips and attempt to enforce such a system of laws in your States. Our charter for action would be the Constitution of the United States; and where that forbade us to go, we would not go.

A great many things have been done during the last few years that I believe surpass anything ever before seen in America. The great demoralization that exists throughout the country, both in public and private life, has had its sanction and authority in the acts of those high in power and influence. Do you expect that when men come together and fill office, and swear to abide by the Constitution, and then disregard its plain provisions, the mass of the people will respect private rights and pay proper regard to the lives and property of their fellow-citizens? In my judgment, a great portion of the demoralization now existing in the country may be attributed to that cause. My hope was that on the restoration of peace we would come back to the old principle of taking the Constitution for our guide, restoring the courts and the rights of action in them, setting the people to work with all their means and all their industry and all their hopes, so that America should prosper as before, and so that we should have the ability to meet the engagements occasioned by the war. But, sir, it would be in vain to indulge such a hope when I see, as I think I see, in this bill and its twin sister behind it, a provision, not for restoring the local State governments, but for governing the people of the States without any regard whatever to the States themselves. Heretofore it has been considered that under the Constitution of the United States you could not take a foot of land in one of the States, even for a fort or an arsenal, without the consent of the State; but by this bill you propose to obtain land in the States and to become a landlord and renter of land to colored people. Do you think that that will tend to conciliate the affections of the people in those States? How much sooner, by this course of legislation, will you have a united country?

Mr. President, let me say that in my opinion we are not in a condition to continue the state of things now existing in the southern States. Our relations with foreign countries are in a very unsettled state. Our difficulties with England still remain unadjusted. Our relations with France are not settled. This Mexican question remains environed with difficulties. Whatever may be thought of the Monroe doctrine, we cannot but feel that it was unkind on the part of the Emperor of France, while we were engaged in our domestic troubles, to import an army into Mexico and set up an emperor there right opposite to us; a man who, according to the newspapers, is now shooting by wholesale all the prisoners that he captures. I have ever believed, and still believe, that if we had settled the difficulties among ourselves, if we had adopted the President's policy toward the southern States and admitted them to participation in the national councils, that very act of conciliation going forth from America, announcing to all the nations of the earth that we were one people again, would have given us a greater guarantee of peace than we have ever had. If a necessity should arise for calling forth the energies of the nation again in foreign war, I should be for sustaining the national honor; but I cannot disguise from myself the fact that we are just now in no condition to involve ourselves in further difficulties.

Mr. President, I had hoped that there was a different spirit among the representatives of the people in relation to uniting together all the States, including the so-called confederate or rebellious States. I do not wish to say anything offensive, but the whole tenor of the remarks that have been made here during this session toward the people of those States, including those who have been pardoned by the President, has not been the language of conciliation or of kindness. I was as strongly in favor of the suppression of the rebellion as any man. I tried, as far as I had power, and as far as a man of my age could try, to prevent the war; but when it came, I spoke the language of hope as to the result. I thought there was a reason in the tread of armies that would bring the Union to safety. I regret that we are not nearer a Union, that we are not nearer that spirit of conciliation which would make us one. No great people on the face of the earth has ever been conciliated or made friendly by such discussions as we have had here; it is impossible that they should be. I think the Government will be safe if we adopt the policy laid down by the President. I confess that I am astonished at the success he has met with in restoring the southern States. He has done more with them than I expected he could do, knowing them as well as I did. I believe they are sincere and honest in their desire to come back to the Union. That there are some idle men there who talk at random I do not pretend to deny; but the great mass of the people accept the situation, and mean to be loyal to the United States.

I am sorry that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has inserted in this bill a provision looking to the permanent establishment of this bureau. I am one of those who believed that while the war was going on, while the States did not recognize their allegiance to the Union, something should be done for these people. It was done, and this bureau was created to look after their interests during the war. But I supposed that as soon as the war was over there would be no occasion for continuing it, because we should be one people again, and this whole subject would be left to the States themselves. I should feel greatly relieved if that provision were stricken from the bill.

In a financial point of view, how much better would it be for the country to have the people of these States friends in the Union than to have them out, with the irritation which every man here knows must be going on between the agents of the bureau and the citizens continually. It is a festering sore that will enlarge and grow with time. I thought that the nation was prepared for peace, that it was prepared for bringing back these States. I thought it was the interest of the nation that we should have peace, that we should have a consolidated nation. I believed that there was no other security required than we had gained in the battles which suppressed the rebellion; that there was none other, indeed, that we ought to call for. I did not believe that this nation wanted the Union restored except upon the principles of equality that existed in the original Constitution.

If you insist upon extending the right of suffrage to the African race, in the name of God extend it to them in all the States of the Union, and do not confine your action to the southern States, placing it as a mark of degradation and inequality upon them when they come back. If you put that lasting mark of degradation upon them, it will be a festering sore to them and theirs for generations to come; and as we are advised by the experience of all those who have gone before us, when a mark of degradation is placed upon a people, they are generally ready to seize a promising opportunity to rebel against it. I shall not go into the history of the world to prove this. It is known to be the history of man in all ages from the first, and it will be so to the last. You cannot degrade any portion of your population and put a mark and stain upon them without leaving cause of heart-burning and difficulty that will endanger the public security hereafter.

I hope that the North and the South henceforth will not undervalue each other. I made as strong an effort as I could to prevent the South from seceding. I told them that the North had such superior numbers as would crush them. When I returned from the peace conference I thought that both sides were willing for the conflict, and that nothing short of blood would stop it. I went home and told the Kentuckians so, and told them also that they must prepare for it. For a time it seemed doubtful, perhaps, which side would get their support; but the cause of the Union prevailed with the people of Kentucky, and Kentucky has been true to the Union always. I hope gentlemen will consent to strike Kentucky out of the bill. We can take care of ourselves, and we pledge you that Kentucky will do what is right toward these people.

Mr. POMEROY. I have listened to the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, and have been gratified to some extent by them, and especially to hear that it was held now even in the adhering States that held slaves, that the constitutional amendment rendered null and void all the enactments of the State Legislatures upholding and maintaining slavery. I do not know that I understood the Senator aright; but if I did, in the commencement of his remarks he said that it was held even in the adhering States, like Kentucky, that the code relating to slavery was made null and void by the constitutional amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE. That is my own opinion, and that is the opinion also of Mr. Johnson of Lexington, who is one of the ablest lawyers in the State.

Mr. POMEROY. I am certainly gratified to learn that that doctrine is held in the State of Kentucky, and perhaps in all the States. It goes far to show to my mind that those enactments originally were not above the Constitution of the United States, and that if they were ever constitutionally right, they perhaps could never have been repealed; but it is now confessed that the constitutional amendment abolishes them and renders them null and void, and that certainly is very gratifying. The point that I desire to suggest is this: it is held by the Senator, I believe, that in the State of Kentucky there is no essential difference between persons of color and white persons in their civil rights. That is entirely new to me, because I have never known a State that held slaves which admitted colored testimony against white men.

Mr. GUTHRIE. We do not do that; but that is what we are working for now in the Legislature.

Mr. POMEROY. Then it cannot be true that the civil rights of persons of color in Kentucky are the same as the rights of white men. The third point that I noticed particularly in the speech of the Senator was that we ought to welcome back the representatives of the southern States because their experience would be so valuable to the Senate and the country. To my mind, if any class of men on earth ever had a most bitter experience, it is the people who undertook to secede and rebel. Their experience may be very valuable to them; I hope it is; but I think it is no experience that would be instructive to us. I believe it is the very last experience that any of us would either imitate or profit by. That the way of transgressors has been hard I have no doubt; but that their return to this Senate, or to the other House, will be valuable as a matter of experience I do not believe. At the same time, I would not interpose obstacles to their coming back, with any view of punishment. I think the Senator misunderstands us entirely. Everything ought to be required for safety, but nothing for revenge, nothing by way of punishment. Persons overtaken in their own transgressions are usually punished enough; and I think if a severe punishment has ever been meted out to any people it has been meted out to those who have been engaged in the rebellion.

But I think we ought not to neglect or overlook the fact that we are required to do everything for safety, so that when the Union is restored it may remain forever; and if there is any security required or needed, this is the time to have it. To receive back these States with the idea that anything can be required of them hereafter I believe would be folly. I think, and I believe the sentiment of the country is, that we ought now to provide such securities for the future that another rebellion will be impossible in a thousand years.

Mr. WILSON. If a vote is to be taken on the pending amendment without consuming further time, I shall not say anything; but I arose for the purpose of moving an adjournment; it is Saturday afternoon, and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 22, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant, copies of all documents, papers, and maps on file in his Department relating to the branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Sioux City, Iowa; which, on motion of Mr. FOOT, was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of one hundred and thirty citizens and residents in the District of Columbia, praying that a law may be passed abolishing all distinctions among the citizens on account of color; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FOOT presented a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a communication from Mr. C. Brumidi, accompanied by a design for a historical painting in fresco, for the embellishment of the interior of the new dome of the Capitol, illustrative of American history; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a memorial from the Boston Board of Trade, in which they set forth that at the outbreak of the late rebellion Boston merchants had very large claims in the rebel States, that by the operation of the statutes of limitations in those States proceedings for the recovery of those claims are now outlawed, and they, accordingly, pray that Congress will pass a law exempting suitors in the national courts of the United States from the operation of State statutes of limitations for a period long enough to give loyal creditors an opportunity to enforce their demands. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer a memorial from the colored citizens of the State of South Carolina in convention assembled, representing, as the Senate will remember, four hundred and two thousand citizens of that State, being a very large majority of the population. They set forth the present condition of things in South Carolina, and pray that Congress will see that the strong arm of law and order is placed over the entire people of that State that life and property may be secure. They also ask that government in that State shall be founded on the consent of the governed, and insist that that can be done only where equal suffrage is allowed. They also ask that colored men should not be tried by white men, but that they should have juries for themselves, and they ask also that they should have the constitutional protection in keeping arms, in holding public assemblies, and in complete liberty of speech and of the press. This memorial is accompanied by a printed document containing a report of the proceedings of this colored convention in South Carolina. I offer these and ask their reference to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The papers were so referred.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Cyrus M. Harmon, praying for compensation for the destruction of the presses, stock, type, furniture, and material of his printing establishment, at Ravenswood, Jackson county, West Virginia, September 4, 1862, by the rebel authorities; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Horatio G. Onderdonk, praying that the stamp required to agreements for the rent of ground be proportioned to the amount of the rent; the repeal of the tax on gold watches worth thirty dollars; an equalization of the annual tax on incomes; a modification of the rate of taxation, and the abolition of the laws which enable the assessor of the income tax to oppress the citizen; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I present the petition of William M. Price, and other citizens of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, praying that eight hours may be a legal day's work to all workmen, artisans, and laborers employed by the United States. I believe a similar petition was heretofore referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; and I make the same motion in regard to this.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON presented the petition of John P. McElroy, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Walter H. Tinker, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and papers of Jesse F. Gray. No action has been taken upon them. He wishes to present them, I believe, in another shape.

Leave was granted.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 73) to restore to the Secretary of War the supervisory and appellate powers in relation to the acts and duties of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. FESSENDEN. *The committee appointed to take into consideration the condition of the so-called confederate States, with leave to report from time to time, have directed me to make a partial report in the shape of a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read the first time by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I ask to have it read at length.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, &c., (two thirds of both Houses concurring.) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, to wit:

ARTICLE — Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed; Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 90) enlarging the powers of the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 91) for the improvement of the navigation of the Colorado river, and the construction of wagon roads in Arizona and Utah Territories; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 92) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the waters of the bay of San Francisco to Humboldt bay, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 93) to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 36) referring the papers in the case of F. A. Gibbons and F. X. Kelley to the Court of Claims, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 36) referring the papers in the case of F. A. Gibbons and F. X. Kelley to the Court of Claims, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

JURORS AND WRITS OF ERROR.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 84, in relation to the qualifications of jurors and to writs of error in certain cases.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill as originally introduced by Mr. DOOLITTLE.

Mr. CLARK. I hardly think it is necessary to read the bill through as introduced into the Senate, because the Committee on the Judiciary recommend the adoption of an amendment as a substitute for the whole bill. Perhaps the reading of the amendment, which involves substantially the provisions of the original bill, will be sufficient.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the reading of the original bill will be dispensed with, and the amendment reported by the committee in lieu of the original bill will be read instead of proceeding further with the reading of the original bill.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the original bill, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That no person shall be disqualified to act upon any grand or petit jury by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion upon the matter or cause to be submitted to such jury, founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety, provided he be otherwise competent, and it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court, upon his declaration under oath, or otherwise, that he can and will, notwithstanding such an opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters to be submitted to him.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any question of law arising upon a trial of any person in any district or circuit court of the United States, or in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, for any offense, the punishment whereof may be death, may be removed to the Supreme Court of the United States by writ of error, to be sued out within sixty days after the entry of the final judgment in such case in the courts below; and thereupon proceedings shall be stayed in said courts, and the questions of law heard and determined in said Supreme Court of the United States, and such order sent to the court below, affirming or reversing the judgment, as the determination of such questions of law may require.

Mr. CLARK. The amendment proposed by the committee contains the substance of the original bill, but throws it, as the committee think, into a better form. I presume there will be no objection on the part of anybody in favor of the bill to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I introduced the bill which was referred to the committee, and I certainly have no objection to the amendment. I think the committee have thrown the measure in a better form than it was originally as drawn by myself.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no objection to the amendment reported by the committee; indeed I think it is a much better statement of the point in question; but I should like to ask the Senator who reported the bill whether, by this proposition, it is intended to set aside the ruling of Chief Justice Marshall on the trial of Burr with regard to jurors?

Mr. CLARK. I think it would modify that ruling to some extent.

Mr. SUMNER. That, as the Senator is aware, has been for now more than a generation the received law of the country.

Mr. CLARK. That may be very true in some of the States; but one difficulty which the committee design to remedy is a diversity of practice in different States, and we seek to bring the whole practice in the United States courts in this respect to the same standard. In some of the States, until the last session, the practice was to use triers in cases of this kind. This bill refers the question of the qualification or interest of a juror to the court, and perhaps that is the best place to lodge it, though I think we did that by a bill at the last session; but the great object of the first section of the bill is first to introduce a uniform practice into the Federal courts in the different States, and in the next place to remove what might be an apparent objection to jurors serving in certain cases by reason of having formed an opinion upon general notoriety, or from rumor, or from the public journals.

Mr. SUMNER. I see no objection to the second section of the bill under consideration; I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire in regard to that. I am not so sure about the first section, and there seem to me to be two objections to it. Whether they are sufficiently strong to justify us in opposing it, it will be for the Senate to determine. I simply call attention to them. The first is that the section does positively set aside what, down to this day, on the ruling of the highest magistrate of this country, has been the law of the courts. To that the Senator very aptly replies, however, that it is important to give uniformity to the practice in the different United States courts. On that point I agree with him. If his proposition simply went to that point, I should not venture even to make a suggestion with regard to it, excepting as to its nature; but it does go further. It does set aside what my honorable friend, the learned Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] knows well was the decision of Chief Justice Marshall; and what has been also the practice in many of the States of the Union. It is the practice in my own State. I believe also it is the practice here in the District of Columbia. I therefore venture to go against that rule only with a certain hesitation.

But then comes another consideration which perhaps is more important. So far as I comprehend the bearing of this first section, it is to meet an actual case of unprecedented historical importance; it is to pave the way for the trial of that grandest criminal in the history of the world who is now in the custody of this Government. Now, sir, that question should be approached carefully, most discreetly, and I humbly submit unless the reasons shall be found to be of the strongest character, with absolute reference to the existing law of the land. I shrink from changing the law of the land in order to meet an individual case, even though that case may be of the transcendent importance of the one to which I now refer. I venture, then, to ask whether, still further, there is not in the proposition something of an ex post facto character. I am not going to argue that it is not in the power of Congress to make changes in the modes of procedure and of trial even after the crime has been perpetrated, but I do humbly submit that in view of the positive limitations of the Constitution it is a very doubtful course to enter upon.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I certainly very heartily approve of the opinions and sentiments expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts who has just taken his seat. A proposition to change the law in relation to the qualification of jurors in criminal cases is a very grave one, and I think that the Senator from Massachusetts has entered a very proper and just caveat against changing that law with a view to any individual case. I feel no sympathy with Jefferson Davis, and I do not believe that the friends of the Union ought to feel any particular enmity toward him, because I believe that he, by his errors and blunders, contributed more to the overthrow of the confederation and the successes of the Union arms than any other man in America.

But, irrespective of all questions in relation to Jefferson Davis or anybody else, here is a most plain and important principle of criminal proceedings—a principle that received the sanction of Chief Justice Marshall in the trial of Aaron Burr more than fifty years ago. Here is the greatest jurist of the United States in one of the most interesting and important prosecutions for treason that has ever originated in the United States, after elaborate argument and deliberate consideration, settling that principle. It seems to me that the Congress of the United States ought to be very well assured that the principle is wrong, and that the innovation which they are about to make upon it would be permanently right without regard to the temporary condition of the country at this time or without regard to the case of any special criminals, and that it ought to seek after the true principle in the permanent existence of the Government and the permanent administration of the criminal law. I therefore think that before this matter is acted upon the amendment had better be printed and Senators allowed time deliberately to examine it.

Mr. CLARK. It is printed.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, give us time to consider it; let us have time to examine it; let the honorable Senator from New Hampshire move to take up this important subject on a particular day, and with a view to its consideration on that day. Senators will read and examine the proposition. I hope that it will not be pressed to a decision at this time.

Mr. CLARK. I certainly will not press the consideration of the bill upon any Senator, not to say upon the Senate, who desires further time for its examination. It is, as the Senator from Kentucky has well said, a grave matter, a matter which should receive the due and careful deliberation of the Senate. Nor shall I undertake at this time to say or to deny that the Committee on the Judiciary, in examining this matter, did refer to and did consider the important bearing of the measure which is now before the Senate upon a distinguished criminal (if I may use that phrase in this connection) now expected to be tried; but I will say this: in coming to the conclusion that they have reported to the Senate, the committee considered—and I suggest it to Senators for their consideration—whether it may not be our duty, if we cannot otherwise secure the trial of that offender, so to modify the law. I have no objection if the Senator desires that the bill shall be postponed to tomorrow or any future time that the Senate may order. I do not propose myself to make it a special order, because the bill, though a grave one, is not long, is easily comprehended, and may be called up before the Senate in the morning hour or at any other time when we have opportunity for that purpose. I have no objection to its being postponed until Thursday or Friday.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before the motion is put to postpone the bill until Thursday, I ask the indulgence of my honorable friend to make a single remark.

Mr. CLARK. I have made no motion, and the Senator would be in order if I had.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As I understand the law of juries, originally jurors were summoned from the vicinage of the offense, because they knew all about it, and sometimes even upon their own knowledge would decide in the case. Decisions of the courts, however, changed that old rule, and carried it so far as to say that the jurors should be not only entirely without interest, but without even the bias which an opinion would have upon the mind. But upon that point the courts in this country have widely differed.

In Massachusetts and in New York they went to the extreme point of saying that the bias of an opinion, no matter from what sources of information derived, should be sufficient to exclude; and as has been said, Chief Justice Marshall, in the Burr trial, following up the old decisions of Massachusetts and New York, and relying upon them mainly for authorities, laid down very much the same doctrine. At the same time it is but just to say that in the State of Virginia, in the State of Illinois, and in several of the other great States of the Union, the contrary doctrine has always been held, that an opinion based upon rumors, public newspapers, general reports, the common history or notoriety of the time, was but a hypothetical opinion which would not exclude a juror, provided the court should be satisfied, as this bill now provides the courts must be satisfied, that the juror would act impartially upon the case. There has been this conflict of opinion, and the committee have justly provided that this provision shall apply not only to treason cases but to all criminal cases—murder, arson, piracy. And, Mr. President, from the very necessity of modern times and its civilization and the publication of newspapers and telegraphic reports, it becomes proper that the law on the subject should be changed.

Mr. President, there is another consideration in reference to the matter if this provision should apply to any trial for treason. It must be borne in mind that the Constitution requires on a treason trial the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act to insure conviction, so that by no possibility in a treason case could this law in any way whatever prejudice the accused. The law does not require the same thing in a trial for murder, or arson, or perjury, but in treason it is required.

I did not rise to go into an argument, but simply, as my honorable friend from Massachusetts has spoken of the settled law of the country, to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is a great conflict of opinion between the authorities in the different States on this subject; and it is known that the courts of the United States where they sit in the trial of causes follow the law of the State in which they sit on the subject of evidence and proceedings in trials. I have no objection, certainly, to allowing this question to go over until Thursday, and, if no other person makes the motion, I move that the bill be postponed until Thursday next.

Mr. CLARK. I have not the least objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And that it be made the special order of that day at one o'clock. ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire that it shall be made a special order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well; I move simply that the bill be postponed until the morning hour of Thursday next.

Mr. CLARK. It may go over for three or four days; and after that lapse of time I shall again call the attention of the Senate to it, and it can be taken up as may be deemed convenient.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the resolution referring certain subjects to the joint committee upon the condition of the States lately in rebellion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We all understand what it is; there is no practical importance in it; we are having no disputes on that question; and unless the Senator from Rhode Island feels a particular anxiety to get up that resolution, which led to some discussion the other day, I will move that we take up the bill which was under consideration on Saturday last, and which comes up at one o'clock to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Rhode Island is before the Senate, undisposed of.

Mr. ANTHONY. If this resolution is going to lead to debate, I do not desire to press it, but I should like to have it disposed of pretty soon. I am very anxious also that the Senator from Illinois should have his bill disposed of as soon as possible. If a vote can be had on this resolution without further debate, I hope it will be taken up and disposed of; if not, I will ask that it be postponed until to-morrow morning, and made the special order for the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution indicated by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not understand that there will be any debate upon it. I suggest that the Senate take up the resolution, and if it leads to debate, I will move to postpone it and make it the special order for to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. ANTHONY on the 19th of December last:

Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered, all papers presented to the Senate relating to the condition and title to representation of the so-called confederate States shall be referred to the joint committee upon that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] to insert the words "except credentials" after the word "papers."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As my colleague, who advocated the other day the passage of this resolution, insists, and that seems to be the general understanding, that the language of the resolution does not embrace credentials, I shall not insist upon the amendment, but withdraw it with that understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn, and the question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 60.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. COWAN to insert in the seventh line of the first section after the word "all" the word "such," and after "United States" the words "as have been lately in rebellion;" so that it will read:

That the act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, approved March 3, 1865, shall continue in force until otherwise provided by law, and shall extend to refugees and freedmen in all such parts of the United States as have been lately in rebellion, and the President may divide the section of country containing such refugees and freedmen into districts, &c.

Mr. CRESWELL. I sincerely hope that that amendment will not be adopted. There is assuredly a necessity for the operation of this bill in the State which I in part represent on this floor. I have received within the last two or three weeks letters from gentlemen of the highest respectability in my State asserting that combinations of returned rebel soldiers have been formed for the express purpose of persecuting, beating most cruelly, and in some cases actually murdering the returned colored soldiers of the Republic. In certain sections of my State the civil law affords no remedy at all. It is impossible there to enforce against these people so violating the law the penalties which the law has prescribed for these offenses. It is, therefore, necessary, in my opinion, that this bill shall extend over the State of Maryland. So far as the amendment applies to my State, I object to its operation, and I hope the Senate will concur with me in so objecting.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it will be remembered by Senators that from the time the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] on the 22d day of July, 1861, reported in favor of making free the slaves used by rebels for military purposes, down to the triumphant passage through the House of Representatives the other day of the equal suffrage bill for the District of Columbia, timid friends and opponents alike have indulged in predictions in regard to the results of our legislation here. Although in all cases their prophetic utterances have been falsified by time and the facts, and though the records of the country will show to all coming time that they were wrong and the friends of the series of measures were right, that anti-slavery measures weakened the enemies and strengthened the friends of the country, that anti-slavery measures lifted up our country in the eyes of the Christian and civilized world, and brought down upon it the blessings of Almighty God, they still continue to prophesy and to oppose the completion of the great work that will establish universal liberty in our country.

When we had before us in 1861 the little bill to make free the slaves used for military purposes, Senators prophesied, or expressed their apprehensions and fears, and the only Senator who was right among them all was John C. Breckinridge, who said that that measure was the beginning of the breaking of all bonds. When we abolished slavery in the District of Columbia Senators predicted that this District would be ruined, that the jails would be filled, and that universal anarchy and confusion would reign here.

Mr. GRIMES. And that there would be an insurrection here.

Mr. WILSON. And they prophesied, as the Senator from Iowa suggests, that there would be an insurrection here. Every prediction made on that occasion has been falsified by four years of history.

When we proposed, in 1862, to make free the slaves of rebels we were told that it would strengthen the confederacy and weaken the cause of the country. We passed that bill, and it weakened the enemies of the country and strengthened the friends of the country.

When we put the rifle into the hand of the black soldier to fight for the country, we were told that he would not fight; that white men would not fight with him; that the policy would strengthen the enemies of the country and weaken the cause of the country. We put muskets into the hands of one hundred and seventy-eight thousand black soldiers, and on many battle-fields they fought and bled for the country with a heroism unsurpassed, and the white soldiers of the Republic fought with them, bled with them, and died with them for a common country. The enemy were driven, in the last hours of the rebellion, to offer liberty to their own slaves if they would fight for the confederacy; but the slaves spurned the offered liberty, though ready to die for the old flag, now radiant with the beauties and glories of freedom.

When the proclamation of emancipation was issued by Abraham Lincoln, we were told by timid friends that the country would be ruined, that our cause was lost, and that the friends of the country and of impartial freedom would be overwhelmed by the indignation of the people. That act that gave freedom to three and a half million men, and made Abraham Lincoln's name the most precious name of this century, strengthened immensely the cause of the country, and broke the backbone of the rebellion.

When the constitutional amendment, the great crowning act, was proposed, we had the same timid friends, doubting and halting and prophesying; and joining with opponents they fought it inch by inch; but it passed both Houses of Congress, has been sustained by the country, and is stronger to-day than any party or set of men in the land.

We all remember that when the bill for the establishment of this Freedmen's Bureau was before us the same prophecies were made, the same apprehensions expressed, and the same kind of opposition made that has been made to all the long series of glorious measures that have tended to the emancipation of a race and to the strengthening of our country; and these prophecies and apprehensions, too, have all been falsified by the action of that bureau during the last six months. I say, sir, that the man does not live with powers great enough to express the positive good that bureau has done, and none but Almighty God knows the evil it has prevented. I say here to-day that millions upon millions have been produced by the establishment of that bureau that would not have been produced had it never been established. Last spring when the rebellion went down there were in the rebel States three and a half million freedmen without work or property. They felt they were free; they may have had wild notions of what freedom brought to them; they certainly were disposed to show in the first place that they were free by leaving the employment of their old masters. By so doing they were proving that they were free—the most natural thing in the world. Their masters did not recognize practically their freedom. The agents of the bureau went into that country, told the old master that his former slave was a free man, as free as himself, that he must recognize that freedom, and that he must deal with his former slave as a man having equal rights with himself before the laws of the country. The agents of the bureau taught the freedmen, also, the duties that freedom brought to them and the obligations it imposed upon them. By this intervention, by this carrying of justice, equity, and humanity into these rebel States, it harmonized the old masters and the new freedmen. It made both parties look to practical results, and thus tens and tens of thousands of freedmen went to work for wages, and the crop of last autumn was immeasurably increased by the action of this bureau. I undertake to say that all the money, toil, and labor expended by the bureau is not the one tenth part of one per cent. of the increase of product added to the country, to say nothing of the peace, the harmony, and the enforcement of justice in that country.

Now, sir, all over these States, wherever the Freedmen's Bureau has a good foothold, the rights of the freedmen are generally respected and enforced, and the old slave-masters themselves are coming to the realization of the new condition of things, and some of them accept it; but wherever the Freedmen's Bureau does not reach, where its agents are not to be found, there you will find injustice and cruelty, and whippings and scourgings and murders that darken the continent. No man can deny this. Go ask Colonel Brown, who has the superintendence of Virginia, and who has been complimented by General Howard as one of the most efficient officers in the service; go to Professor Wittlesey of North Carolina; go to General Saxton, who has been one of the truest and most devoted friends of the black men of our country, and who has been called away and is not compelled to see with his own eyes the bitter tears that are being shed over the violated promises that this nation made to the freedmen on the coast of the Carolinas; go to General Tillson, one of our ablest Army officers, and the head of the bureau in Georgia; to General Swayne, the son of one of the judges of our Supreme Court, who has the control in Alabama, and who has written, as I understand, within a few days, that at least five thousand persons have come into that State to engage in business, who, if the bureau is taken away, must leave there—they cannot stay; go to General Fiske, one of the most active men of our country, a devoted, patriotic, and able officer, and a Christian; go to General Baird, in Louisiana; ask glorious Phil Sheridan; go to the men in that country who have studied and who understand these freedmen's affairs, and they all bear one uniform and unbroken testimony to the inestimable benefits to the country of this humane and Christian organization—an organization that is carrying liberty and justice and humanity into the dark corners of a land blighted and cursed by human bondage for two centuries.

Mr. President, we have now before us a proposition to enlarge the powers of this Freedmen's Bureau. The heart of this nation is for it. The Christian men and women of the country, who made this Administration of ours, who put us in these seats, and who hold us responsible before God and the country for our action, are for this organization. They are in favor of enlarging it and keeping it in the South just as long as it may be necessary to keep it there to accustom these people to do justice and to protect these men who are our wards. I am, therefore, in favor of the bill as it came from the Committee on the Judiciary, substantially just as it stands, and I am opposed especially to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not see with what justice we can shut the bureau out of Maryland, where it is needed almost as much as in Virginia, or out of Kentucky, where it is needed quite as much, I think, as it is in Tennessee. It will cost something, but I have no doubt if it does pass, its cost will not be one per cent. upon the increased product it will bring to the country during the coming year.

We proclaimed liberty to three and a half million people in order to break down this rebellion. We did it as a military necessity. We did not do it because it was right to do it, but we did it in defense of the Government of the United States. These people exposed their lives for our country; they discharged their whole duty to the country; they are now thrown upon their own resources, into a hostile community; into a community exhausted by war; into a community where the people are admitted by everybody to be poor; into States which, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GUTHRIE] says, have lost $10,000,000,000 by the war. Who is to take care of them? Who is to protect them against the hostile legislation of those States? The Senator from Kentucky told us, and told us truly, that the old slave codes and laws went down with slavery, but not so think these gentlemen in several of the States. In four or five of the States they have passed codes of laws that practically make the freedman a peon or a serf.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to know what those laws are.

Mr. WILSON. I have not time to read to the Senator the laws of South Carolina, or the laws of Mississippi, or the laws of Louisiana, or the bills that are now pending, if they are not already passed, in the Legislature of Georgia; but we have them all, and I say that the provisions of those acts are wholly inconsistent with freedom. I will state one single provision of those laws. The law of one of the States requires the freedmen to have a residence and a home within twenty days, but it forbids the renting or purchasing of land to them outside of the large towns. What is the poor freedman to do? Go into the highway? There he is a vagrant to be arrested and sold to labor. The tendency of such legislation as that is to continue him an ignorant, degraded, and dependent laborer. At another time, if the Senator does not wish to take the time to read those acts, or if he has not collected them, or if nobody has sent them to him—I hope some one has done so—I will furnish him with those acts, or I will take them and analyze them for his instruction.

Mr. COWAN. One word, sir, with the permission of the Senator. I have only to say that the Constitution of the United States makes provision by which the rights of no free man, no man not a slave, can be infringed in so far as regards any of the great principles of English and American liberty; and if these things are done by authority of any of the southern States, there is ample remedy now. Under the fifth amendment of the Constitution, no man can be deprived of his rights without the ordinary process of law; and if he is, he has his remedy. How are you going to prevent it? If he does not know his remedies, or if those who back him do not know his remedies, how are we to frame laws and how are we to make provision in violation of these very provisions of the Constitution by which to place a sentinel over every freedman all through the South? I should like to know the particulars of which the honorable Senator complains. I would like to have the very statute read here by which the freedman is deprived of his rights after he is once emancipated under the amendment of the Constitution guaranteeing liberty to everybody. These general assertions and these particular charges are made here; but are we to alter the whole frame and structure of the laws, are we to overturn the whole Constitution, in order to get at a remedy for these people? If they are put upon the same footing as white people, then they have the same remedies as white people; they have the same remedies that the honorable Senator has, or that I have, or that any other Senator has; and there is no necessity for this new jurisdiction, this new power that is to be invoked for their protection. We have been told that if a man was made free, and particularly if these colored people were made free, that that was all that was necessary; that then they would take care of themselves just like other people; and if the laws were framed generally so as to operate upon all people, they would operate upon them, and they would take advantage of it and protect themselves. Now, I should like to have the particulars of these outrages that are to be committed upon these people.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator says that the Constitution of the United States protects these people. I agree that it does so far as the Constitution can do it; and the amendment to the Constitution empowers us to pass the necessary legislation to make them free indeed; and the Senator from Illinois has a bill that is to follow this, and is to be passed, I think, annulling these black codes and putting these people under the protection of just and equal laws. The Legislature of Louisiana has passed an act by which the Senator, if he reads it, will see that any freedman who makes a contract under it is perfectly at the control and will of the man with whom he makes the contract. If that man is a bad man, at the end of the year the freedman will not receive a farthing for his year's labor. He can trump up charges to cheat and defraud the laborer. So odious are these laws that the Freedmen's Bureau has set them aside wherever it has had the power to do so; and the other day General Grant issued an order setting aside these very laws, and the Army of the United States is ordered by him to arrest the execution of the laws of four or five of these States, because they in reality reduce the freedman to the condition of a serf, or at any rate of a peon. The Lieutenant General of our Army has ordered the Army in these States to arrest the execution of these laws, so odious and so oppressive are they, and the nation applauds the order. Now, sir, we propose not only to empower this bureau to protect the freedmen against these laws and all other laws of the same character, but to pass an act that shall set them aside and give the freedman a practical remedy by taking his case at once before the authorities of the United States.

The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. GUTHRIE,] on Saturday, opposed the passage of this bill, but he made two declarations for which I sincerely thank him. I hope the people of the rebel States will understand that the distinguished Senator from Kentucky has proclaimed on the floor of the Senate of the United States that the slave codes of those States fell when slavery fell. If these laws went down with slavery, what right have the people there to make laws tending to the same end? I thank the Senator for that declaration.

The honorable Senator uttered this great truth:

"You cannot degrade any portion of your population, and put a mark, a stain, upon them without leaving cause of heart-burning and difficulty that will endanger the public security hereafter."

Sir, that is a noble sentiment. It is a sentiment that lives in the heart, the brain, and the conscience of the loyal people of America. They see, feel, realize that you cannot degrade any portion of your population without leaving heart-burnings and difficulties that will endanger the peace of the future. It is because we who fill these seats, and those who sent us here, believe, religiously believe, this declaration of the Senator from Kentucky that we oppose filling up the vacant seats in this Chamber again without security against such degradation. It is because we believe in the truth of that declaration that we demand that by irreversible guarantees no portion of the population of the country shall be degraded or have a stain put upon them. I want the Senator from Kentucky, and all others in this Chamber and elsewhere, I want the men of the rebel States, to understand that we who are here, and those whom we represent, believe in that sentiment as we believe in the commandments of Almighty God. I want them to understand that we mean to see it enforced, cost what it may of time, of toil, or of money.

I want them to understand, too, that we believe in the equality of States in the Union, and the equality of men in the States. We believe in the equality of the States and in the equality of men; and thus believing, we demand security for the future before we again intrust power to men who, in the past, were false and recreant to the cause of liberty and to the cause of their country.

The Senator from Kentucky tells us that he is sorry to find a feeling of hostility here toward the people of the rebel States; that he would act as our officers act—meet them as gentlemen and countrymen. I, too, would do the same thing. I know there is no hostility to the people of the rebel States. I speak for my own State, and I say there are not a thousand men in Massachusetts who entertain feelings of unkindness or of hostility toward the people of the rebel States. On the contrary, we want them back here, and we want them with us just as soon as we can have them here and have with them ample guarantees and securities for the rights of all men in the country. Now sir, "I know whereof I affirm" when I say that the people of the loyal States, who have given their sons and their blood to the putting down of this rebellion, desire that the southern people shall come back again, that all the seats in these Chambers shall be filled; but we want them to come back when we have secured ample and irreversible guarantees for the rights and liberties of all men; and I tell the Senator from Kentucky further, that we mean to have them and that we are sure to get them.

I know that there are some persons and there are some newspapers, some strolling journals that eke out their precarious existence upon the bounty we foolishly fling to them, who tell us that the corrupting influences of public patronage ought to be used to arrest the great ideas and practical measures we advocate in the adjustment of these questions of reorganization. Now, I say to everybody who has that thought in his brain that the people of this country are in no temper to be sold. They have decided that negroes shall not be bought nor sold, and they are equally unanimous that their Senators and Representatives shall not sell them for Government patronage. If there is anybody in the country who is disposed to be bought or sold he will find that the American people will blast him by their withering scorn and indignation. Go to the two million soldiers who have fought the battles of their country; go to the loyal men who have furnished nearly three thousand million dollars to meet the needs of your Treasury, and attempt to buy them with the little petty patronage of this Federal Government! They will spurn the bribe whenever you offer it. They will scorn you and your patronage. This is not the old Whig party, that never professed to have an idea on earth, a party that simply advocated tariffs and banks and moneyed measures; nor is it the Democratic party corrupted by slavery.

Sir, it is a party that plants its foot on the rock of ages, and has all the measureless moral forces of the universe to sustain it. From a small beginning, like the cloud in the heavens, not so large as a man's hand, it has developed into a gigantic, overmastering power, and has marched on until it has twenty-three of the twenty-five loyal States under its control, and I doubt not it will take possession of the others about as soon as it desires to get them. The earnest men, who every time they look about their own dwellings see the vacant chairs of dead sons fallen in battle, who every time they cast their sad eyes into their graveyards look upon the little mounds that cover their kindred fallen in battle, who see as they walk their streets maimed and wounded neighbors who have fought and bled for their country, are in no temper to be trifled with, to be bought or to be sold. They are stronger to-day for irreversible guarantees than they were yesterday; they will be stronger to-morrow than they are to-day; and if anybody desires to put over the adjustments of these questions to another year and to go before the patriotic people of this country on that issue, we shall welcome the contest. I predict the result of such action will be that there will be fewer in these Halls willing to allow these seats to be filled without further guarantees. We are not mistaken in these matters; we have not been for a dozen years; we understand the American people, their temper, and their purposes.

Sir, we want these freedmen protected; we mean to have them protected. And there is another thing which we want: we want it settled that we are not to pay $2,000,000,000 for slaves emancipated; and that we are not to pay debts, whether they be $3,000,000,000 or $10,000,000,000, incurred to destroy the country, and that we are not to pay pensions to men who fought against their country. I tell Senators that in view of the manifestations in the rebel States during the last sixty days, the holders of your public securities are growing anxious, and some of them are more than anxious in regard to those securities. Every hour that vast capital, with its clear instincts, sees the danger and will ward off the danger. I tell you that the men who have been maimed and wounded by the war, and who have fought your battles, and who are pensioned by your Government for the blood they have given to the country, are anxious in regard to the security of the future. These mighty agencies, quietly reaching into every village and hamlet of the country, are working their potent influences, and the loyal States are stronger to-day in demanding guarantees than they ever were, and will grow stronger until those guarantees are secured. Let the statesmen of the country who breathe an atmosphere tainted with the breath of traitors or of sycophants remember this declaration. Let the men of the rebel States realize the condition of affairs and accept the adjustment that gives security to man and to property.

Sir, I know, too, that we all want to reach the end of a final settlement of all these questions. I do not desire to utter any reproaches or to heap any opprobrium upon the people of the rebel States. I do not wish their money or their blood; I would not take a dollar from them if I could, for they have been punished enough, more even than a generous foe would inflict. I do not expect them before they come back here to love us or to be truly loyal; I do not expect them to like this bureau; I do not think they like General Grant's order arresting the execution of their black laws; I do not think they like any of the measures for the protection of those who were lately their slaves; I do not expect them to love us; I know they will not love me. But our duty is to do justice, to treat them with generous magnanimity, to demand what is right for our good and their good and the peace and repose of our common country. The whole philosophy of our action is in the sentence uttered by the Senator from Kentucky, that we cannot degrade any portion of our population, or put a stain upon them, without leaving heart-burnings and difficulties that will endanger the future of our country. These black men are a portion of our population; they are free, as free as the Senator from Kentucky or myself. Perhaps they are not, some will say, equals; but that is not a question, I think, for us to discuss here. I wish that every man that breathes God's air or walks His green earth was my equal morally, physically, and intellectually. I know that I should not be degraded by the elevation of any man or all the men of the universe.

I think that the bill should be passed, and passed promptly; and the little money that it costs, although it looks large, is but the merest trifle in comparison with the great end to be attained. This bureau will not exist forever. I have no idea that there will be occasion for it to last any great length of time; but so long as it is needed, so long I believe the Christian men and women of this country will demand that it shall be continued. It is demanded by all the people that go into these States to transact business. We hear a great deal about evidence coming from the rebel States, and I have been very much surprised to hear certain evidence questioned here. There is hardly a township in the loyal States that has not some one of its men in the rebel States; he has kindred at home, he has neighbors at home, and the loyal States are shingled over with letters from innumerable witnesses in every portion of those States; their testimony is worth more than that of all the officials in the United States, and will have a thousand times more influence with the people. If a gentleman from my neighborhood, whom I know to be a gentleman of honor and of personal character, is traveling in the heart of Mississippi, and he writes to me and tells me of what he has seen and found there, and of the condition of the people, am I to throw it aside for the statement of some one who has run perhaps through a corner of the State in a railroad car? Of course I shall not do it; and I tell Senators that the people of this country will pay more deference to the utterances of their neighbors whom they know than to all the speeches we can make, or all the public documents we can manufacture.

We know how many of us breathe the air tainted with the breath of traitors, and we know its influence. The people of the loyal States are out on their own fee-simple acres in the clear country where they are away from these personal associations and these professions, where they see things clearly as they are. Therefore the country demands the strengthening of this bureau, the enlargement of its powers, the increase of schools, and the instruction, protection, and elevation of a race. The country knows it will be security for the future, and will harm no right-minded and well-disposed man in any section of the country. What we advocate in this measure is for the security of all; the harm of none; the benefit of all, the injury of none; and it is so with the measure to follow it that is to protect these people. Therefore, sir, I hope we shall, as we have in the legislation of the past five years, go steadily straightforward and onward to enact the needed laws that tend to the freedom, the elevation, the improvement of all our people, and the strength of our country. Sir, just in proportion as we have enacted justice, as we have been faithful to the country and to liberty, have we prospered. As we have passed the series of measures beginning in July, 1861, up to the present time, for the security, the liberty, and the protection of all people, it seems as though God had opened the heavens and rained blessings upon our country, and that the country is stronger now and has a greater influence in the world than ever before. All that we have got to do is to go right on with this work. Let timid men halt, let anybody halt who will, we know that we are right; we have a record that is flashing with light from the past. Let us do this, not talk about war, but let us engage in a vigorous prosecution of peace, and we shall put this country where it will have a power among the nations by the beauty of its life that will control the world and change the destinies of nations.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, under the Constitution of the United States, an instrument which we all upon entering this Chamber swore to support, maintain, and observe—and that oath I presume we mean to keep; at least the country looks upon us to keep it—this Government has certain powers. The first class may be said to be municipal. Under that class it cannot be pretended, I think, by anybody that we have any authority whatever to create a bureau, whether for freedmen or freemen, whether for black men or white men, or men of any other particular color in any of the States. We have no right to select out from the citizens of Pennsylvania, if you please, or the citizens of New York, any particular class of men and withdraw them from the operation of State laws and put them within the peculiar control and protection of such institutions as we may create here for their benefit. I think, sir, that I may say that there is no lawyer in the country, throughout the length and breadth of it, who would ever contend that we have that power delegated to us by the American people under the Constitution of the United States, which Constitution, I say again, we have all taken a solemn oath to support and maintain.

We have another class of powers under the same Constitution which are not municipal in their character, but which enable us to deal with people who are not in obedience to the laws of the country, who are not acknowledging our supremacy in that behalf. Those have been called here war powers, or rather belligerent rights against a belligerent operating as such against us. Now, I presume—I suppose nobody pretends otherwise—that the color and ground upon which we placed the Freedmen's Bureau was that of a belligerent right; that a portion of the United States had occupied or taken that position against us, and enabled us by that means to bring into play upon them those rights which are denominated belligerent. If that be true, (and I suppose it cannot be controverted very well,) then the operation of this bureau could lawfully apply only in that portion of the Union which was in an attitude of belligerency against the United States. My amendment simply proposes to confine it there. I do not undertake to decide by my amendment whether that attitude is still maintained by those States; I do not believe it is; but I am very certain that the loyal States of this Union are not by any means at present within the grasp of the war powers of this Government, and I for one am determined to resist here and everywhere any attempt whatever to put the iron hand of this Government upon any State which has not been in rebellion, and to give belligerent rights as against the peaceful people who rely upon the provisions of their Constitution. Sir, what is tyranny? Is it not usurped rights, or rather things which are alleged to be rights and usurped upon the ground of necessity? There never was any tyranny in the world which did not set up quite as strong a plea for necessity as is set up here.

But that is not the question. This is not a Government in which there is any room for the play of fancy or for the play of a desire for dominion. This is a Government of law; and if there is anything in the world which contradistinguishes it from all other Governments upon the earth, it is that it is a Government by law and a Government of law; and whoever undertakes to assert a power or exercise an authority under it, is bound to put his finger upon the law which authorizes it. If we undertake to assert an authority here, or exercise a power, we are bound to show by the organic law, the Constitution, from whence we derive it.

Where, then, is the authority given in the Constitution to establish a Freedmen's Bureau in Maryland or in Pennsylvania? Let me suppose, for instance, that somebody had proposed this thing ten years ago; is there a man in the Union that would not have been aroused instantly to resistance and indignation at such a usurpation on the part of the General Government or on the part of Congress? Nobody can doubt it; nobody can deny it. Then, sir, I should like to know how this war, how the suppression of this rebellion, has changed the relations which existed between the loyal States and this Government. Are the powers of the General Government enlarged by the exercise of its belligerent rights in putting down the rebellion? If that be so, if we enlarge the power of the Government as against the loyal people every time we exert it to put down a rebellion, or to meet a foreign enemy, then we may be overrun at last.

Mr. President, if this Freedmen's Bureau is to exist at all, if it has any color of authority in the world, it is only that color which it derives from the fact that we occupy a belligerent attitude toward the States lately in rebellion, and not because we have authority by municipal enactments to carry our tribunals there and interfere in their internal police regulations. The Senator from Massachusetts says, however, that we must keep up with the spirit of the age, that it is onward, and that there are certain great ideas which must be carried out, and which will be carried out, and according to his notion he and his people are determined to carry out. Well, sir, that is all in the future. There are a great many people who live outside of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and there are a great many people, I think, who live within that Commonwealth who are not exactly prepared to indorse all the revolutionary measures which are introduced into this Congress, and which are supposed to have their origin there.

As I understand, there are not less than seventy amendments to the Constitution of the United States proposed and now pending in the two branches of Congress. Whoever heard before that that was such a defective instrument that it needed to be amended and thatched all over with these modern crudities, one after another, which are not considered so as to enable them to sustain a moment's examination. We were of opinion heretofore that that Constitution was a very respectable instrument, that it was very well concerted, and that it provided above all things else for the preservation and maintenance of human liberty according to the most approved forms; yet, sir, now it seems that it has to be amended in every direction!

I say, Mr. President—and I happen to represent here as many people as either or both of the Senators from Massachusetts—that the people of Pennsylvania, at least, are opposed to this whole batch of amendments, from one end to the other.

The Constitution was to them sacred; it had preserved and protected them; it had given them prosperity unparalleled for a period of seventy-five years, and they are for preserving it; and they are not for venturing themselves upon this sea of experiment and this flood of innovation which is to end nobody knows where.

It is very easy, Mr. President, to deal in generalities; it is very easy to propose measures; but we have to look back at the practical experience of the past in order to determine that they are to be beneficial for the future.

Now, we are told the most impossible things in the world. We are told that the Constitution and the laws made under it and the machinery for the proper administration of those laws are not adequate to the protection of freedmen; and we are told gravely that the Legislature of Louisiana, in some extraordinary way, not at all made clear or defined, have provided that at the end of the year the laborer is to be at the mercy of the hirer. How? Has the Legislature of Louisiana declared that a contract for the performance of labor can be specifically performed, and that you can compel specific performance in her courts? If she has such a law (and that is the only way I know by which the laborer can be put at the mercy of the hirer in a contract for labor; it is the only possible and conceivable way apart from slavery) such law is clearly void, and there is no possible difficulty in obtaining a remedy for it anywhere and everywhere. The Supreme Court of the United States is sitting here for that purpose to-day, and the freedman is just as much entitled to the benefit of its protection, as I read the laws, as if he were a man of the fairest complexion and of the brightest Saxon mold.

But, Mr. President, we are treated to generalities all the time constantly. There is nothing specific here; there is nothing fixed; there is nothing tangible; there is nothing definite; and I venture the assertion that when the law complained of is brought here it will be found that there is a complete remedy under this much-abused Constitution, which is now to require seventy amendments in order to make it conformable to the new state of things which has been brought about by the last war!

Mr. President, I am not of that opinion. I am for holding fast to that which has been approved and which has approved itself, and I am opposed to any of these innovations, to any of these new things. I am opposed to any precedent which may hereafter be exercised to the deprivation of any man of his liberty or any State of her rights, and I wish to be distinctly understood here that I am in favor of State rights—the lawful, legitimate rights of States; and States have rights as well as the Union has rights. I am not in favor of all those things which were claimed as State rights by certain people in the Union, but I am in favor of those rights which belong legitimately to the States, and which have never been denied to them, and upon which, in my judgment, depends the individual liberty of the people of this country; and whenever they allow this General Government or this Congress to absorb unto itself and to swallow up and annihilate these particular State rights, then, Mr. President, the virtue, the essential virtue, of the Constitution is gone; then the merit of the fabric has disappeared, and it has gone away in that very direction which was predicted long ago by those who warned us of the tendency of power to consolidate and to grasp.

I say that if anybody in the southern States, no matter what his color or complexion may be, is improperly treated there is a remedy; and here let me say that I am opposed to the distinctions that are now taken between our people. Why should we legislate partly for the black man and partly for the white man? The very fact that such a question is mooted, the very fact that it is started here in the Senate of the United States, is an acknowledgment that there is a difference and a distinction between the people of this country which requires such a discrimination on the part of the Government, and is fatal to the claims on the part of the advocates of negro suffrage and negro equality. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts says that all men in this country must be equal. What does he mean by equal? Does he mean that all men in this country are to be six feet high, and that they shall all weigh two hundred pounds, and that they shall all have fair hair and red cheeks? Is that the meaning of equality? Is it that they shall all be equally rich and equally jovial, equally humorous and equally happy? What does it mean? Does he mean that they shall all equally come to the Senate or the United States, that they shall all equally sit in the House of Representatives, that they shall all equally hold office?

Why, Mr. President, if that is the equality that the honorable Senator is aiming for, it will be a very long while before it is realized. What is meant by equality, as I understand it, in the language of the Declaration of Independence, is that each man shall have the right to pursue in his own way life, liberty, and happiness. That is the whole of it. It is not that he shall be an elector, it is not that he shall receive the especial favors of the community in any way; but it means that if he is assailed by one stronger than himself the Government will protect him to punish the assailant. It means that if a man owes another money the Government will provide a means by which the debtor shall be compelled to pay, if it is not barred by the statute of limitations or some other legal contrivance of that kind; that if an intruder and trespasser gets upon his land he shall have a remedy to recover it. That is what I understand by equality before the law. It is not that everybody shall be a Senator and distinguished as my honorable friend from Massachusetts may be, because that is not in the nature of things. There is a large amount of work that has to be done in this world that has to be done by exceedingly humble instruments, and if the instruments were not there the work would not be done. For instance, if all men were to be as learned as my friend from Massachusetts, who would black boots and curry the horses, who would do the menial offices of the world? And if they were not done I should like to know how we could live at all. This world, Mr. President, after all is said and done, is pretty well arranged, in my judgment, and always has been. The imaginary evils that people see in the distribution of wealth and in the distribution of honors and all that kind of thing are not nearly so oppressive as they may be made out to be in the warm and glowing imaginations of those who see fit to champion their victims.

Now, Mr. President, if the Freedmen's Bureau is necessary at all, where is it necessary, to come back to the question raised by this amendment? It is certainly not necessary in Massachusetts. I should be ashamed if Massachusetts had not the means within herself, the means of police, to administer her laws, and to administer them so as to give to all citizens within her borders that liberty, that broad and comprehensive liberty, which is secured by the Constitution and the amendments thereto. And I say, Mr. President, that if the day comes that Pennsylvania cannot and does not afford to all men, of every color, clime, and condition, of every tongue and language, all these securities, I should be ashamed to represent her upon the floor of this Senate. How it may be in Maryland I am not prepared to say; but certainly I cannot but believe that in Maryland to-day, or in Kentucky to-day, or in Missouri to-day, the poor, the oppressed, the injured, have redress the same as heretofore; and surely I think I may aver that same of West Virginia, at the least. Are the rights of these States to be invaded? Is another tribunal to be thrust in there? Is another power to be intruded upon them—in order to do what? To do what it is alleged they have neglected to do, and which of right they ought to do.

The Senator from Massachusetts says, "we are right." Who ever acknowledged they were wrong except very great people indeed? I have always found that the greater the man was the more readily he acknowledged that he was wrong; and the less he was the more pertinaciously he insisted that he was right. [Laughter.] I do not know whether I am right or wrong; I do not undertake to assert it positively, as against everybody else. I think so; and I suppose that that is all the honorable Senator can say for himself; at least, that is all I intend to acknowledge to be the force of his assertion.

I think, Mr. President, that it is right to preserve the frame of Government as nearly as we can which was bequeathed to us by our ancestors; which was wrung out from a superior power by their force and their sacrifices in the revolutionary war, and which was made up and constructed by men, in my judgment, the very first men in that or any other age. I want to preserve that as nearly as I can, and why? Because it has been effectual in securing the end for which it was designed. It is true it did not provide for the enormous increase of slavery which afterward affected about half the Republic, but, thank God, we are now rid of that; that is now gone; and if there was one obstacle in the way two years ago, and which looked as though it were insurmountable to one who desired the restoration of this Union, it was slavery. We made war to compel obedience to the Constitution and the laws, and if the insurgents had laid down their arms at any time during the struggle, what would have resulted? No new powers to the Government; we should have acquired no new rights by suppressing the rebellion, any more than we should have acquired new rights by a policeman arresting a thief or a constable arresting a murderer. We should have returned eo instanti to the status quo ante bellum, and slavery would have risen again in the eye of the law as potent and as legal as ever it was.

That was the fear on the part of all patriots; that was the difficulty, and that difficulty is now removed. Now, we are told of others; and I should like to know where these difficulties are to end. We have made the negro free. Was not that a great thing? The world clapped its hands in abundant rejoicing, and all good people sang hosannas everywhere, whether they understood the question exactly or not. [Laughter.] But what next? After the negro is free we are told that he cannot protect himself; we must do something for him. Well, what more must we do? We must give him a vote. What good will that do him? It will only multiply the chances of his having his head broken at the polls in contact with a much stronger race than he is. [Laughter.] That would be about the result of that; and if we give him a vote tomorrow, what then? Why, helpless, feeble, as nature made him, in the face of the strongest, most rapacious, hardest-bargaining race on the earth. What more must you do for him? You must allow him to hold office. A vote, of course, is a mere induction to the exercise of power.

The power is in the office. Then the negro must hold office; and is he any better after that? What good would an office do to a negro in our society and in our country? An office is valuable to a man, an office is sought after, because it confers social distinction, high social privileges, and power and authority among men. Would office confer that upon the negro?

Mr. President, that is one of the cruellest propositions that could possibly be made. It is crowning with flowers the victim for the sacrifice. It is inscribing over the cross an empty title, when upon that same cross the victim is crucified. What is office without social rights and social distinction? Nothing, nothing. I should like to know where this is going to end—this insane crusade to try to do something which it is not in the nature of things to do? I stand here the friend of the negro, just as much his friend I trust as any other man upon earth; but he who comes to me and undertakes to tell me that this is the same kind of man that I am and that we are generally, and that he is a white man, and that his hair is straight, and that his legs and feet are as well made as those of my honorable friend from Maine, whom I see before me, [Mr. MORRILL,] I do not believe a word of it. [Laughter in the galleries, which was checked by the Presiding Officer.] When he undertakes to tell me that all differences and all these distinctions that are so plainly marked upon the whole face of the man, his color, his form, his disposition, his everything, amount to nothing, that it is a mere prejudice, and is to be swept away by half a dozen debates and the reading of half a dozen reports from certain abolition societies, I distrust the judgment of anybody who comes upon such an errand. It is not true, it never will be true, it never can be true.

The honorable Senator says he is right. Yes, I should say he is right in the face of an antipathy that never sleeps, that never dies, that is inborn, down at the very foundation of our natures, and which will tell to-day, to-morrow, some day, in spite of all attempts to the contrary. Let, then, the friends of the negro, and I am one, be satisfied to treat him as he is treated in Pennsylvania, if you please; as he is treated in Ohio, if you please; as he is treated everywhere where people have maintained their sanity upon this question. I use the word "sanity" with an exact appreciation of what it means. It means that state of mind which takes all the circumstances into consideration, and does the best while surrounded by them.

Now, Mr. President, if, as I said before, a Freedmen's Bureau is absolutely necessary—and it can only be justified upon the ground of absolute necessity—it is only necessary in those States which have been lately in rebellion, and to extend it beyond, and to make it operate or to make it possible that it could operate on other States, is to open the door to an innovation and to form a precedent for a usurpation that may hereafter cost the life of this Republic. I hope, therefore, that my amendment will be adopted, and that whatever we may do in this respect we may at least not violate the fundamental law of this land, that we may not trample directly upon the Constitution and its plain provisions with regard to the rights of the several States.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Pennsylvania tells us that he is the friend of the negro. What, sir, he the friend of the negro! Why, sir, there has hardly been a proposition before the Senate of the United States for the last five years looking to the emancipation of the negro and the protection of his rights that the Senator from Pennsylvania has not sturdily opposed. He has hardly ever uttered a word upon this floor the tendency of which was not to degrade and to belittle a weak and struggling race. He comes here to-day and thanks God that they are free, when his vote and his voice for five years, with hardly an exception, have been against making them free. He thanks God, sir, that your work and mine, our work which has saved a country and emancipated a race, is secured; while from the word "go" to this time he has made himself the champion of "how not to do it." If there be a man on the floor of the American Senate who has tortured the Constitution of the country to find powers to arrest the voice of this nation which was endeavoring to make a race free the Senator from Pennsylvania is the man; and now he comes in here and thanks God that a work which he has done his best to arrest and which we have carried is accomplished. I tell him to-day that we shall carry these other measures, whether he thanks God for them or not, whether he opposes them or not. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FORT.) Order must be preserved in the galleries.

Mr. WILSON. I tell the Senator from Pennsylvania that I know we shall carry them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend for a moment. The order and decorum of the Senate is not to be disturbed by demonstrations of applause or of disapprobation in the galleries. If the offense be repeated the order for clearing the galleries will be made at once.

Mr. WILSON. I tell the Senator from Pennsylvania that I know we shall carry these measures. God is not dead, and we live, and standing upon the eternal principles of His justice, with a Christian nation behind us, and with God's commands ever ringing in our ears, we shall in the future, as we have in the twenty-five years of the past, march right straight forward to battle and to victory over all opposition.

Sir, the Senator from Pennsylvania asks me what I mean by the equality of men; and he puts the trifling question whether I mean that all men shall be six feet high. There would not be many men equal to the Senator from Pennsylvania if we measured by length. He asks whether I mean that one man shall weigh as much as another, or have as much money. Why are these questions put? Does he not know precisely and exactly what we do mean? Does he not know that we mean that the poorest man, be he black or white, that treads the soil of this continent, is as much entitled to the protection of the law as the richest and the proudest man in the land? Does he not know that we mean that the poor man, whose wife may be dressed in a cheap calico, is as much entitled to have her protected by equal law as is the rich man to have his jeweled bride protected by the laws of the land? Does he not know that the poor man's cabin, though it may be the cabin of a poor freedman in the depths of the Carolinas, is entitled to the protection of the same law that protects the palace of a Stewart or an Astor?

The Senator knows what we believe. He knows that we have advocated the rights of the black man because the black man was the most oppressed type of the toiling men of this country. I tell you, sir, that the man who is the enemy of the black laboring man is the enemy of the white laboring man the world over. The same influences that go to keep down and crush down the rights of the poor black man bear down and oppress the poor white laboring man.

The Senator tells us that if all men were equal and all men were learned, we could not get our boots blacked. I believe Henry Clay uttered that folly upon one occasion, and I am not surprised that the Senator should repeat it. It has been the language of the negro drivers in this country for sixty years—of the men who had just as much contempt for the toiling white millions of the country as they had for their own black slaves. But, thank God! the toiling men of the country, the men who stand on their fee-simple acres and call no one master but God, and call no man slave, the mechanics, the working men, have stood by the rights of humanity just as the ranks of our army in Texas stood by their country and the old flag when Twigg's betrayed them. We have put down the rebellion against the people; we have put down slavery, the prolific mother of all our woes; and we have buried deeper than plummet ever sounded the ideas and policy of the past.

The Senator from Pennsylvania may mourn over the degradations of the country; he may be alarmed at the tendency of the times; he is much exercised about the Constitution. He has been dinning his interpretations of the Constitution in our ears for five years. He has been warning us against violating it; and yet, with the Constitution in one hand and the Bible in the other, we have moved right forward, and we have achieved what we fought for. We resisted every temptation to betray the cause of liberty; we accepted civil war rather than betray the cause of God and of the people, and we have triumphed. We have something more to do, and we mean to do it, and if anybody doubts it let him undertake to arrest it. I tell the Senator we were born to do it. God Almighty raised us up at this age to do this work, and we will do it. Beginning with a little handful of men, a despised, abused, and slandered few, humbly sending a petition to the House of Representatives to ask this nation to abandon the slave trade and make free women and children in the national capital, with denunciations piled upon us, with political parties frowning upon us, we have gone on until we stand to-day masters of the situation. It is not our strength; we are no better than other men. The political organization that made this Administration sent us here and sent the Senator from Pennsylvania here. Its men have the same weaknesses and faults as men of other political organizations, and we manifest them to the country every day. But we have accepted the sublime truths of the Declaration of Independence. We stand as the champions of human rights for all men, black and white, the wide world over, and we mean that just and equal laws shall pervade every rood of this nation; and when that is done our work ceases, but not until it is done. If anybody wants to stop this mighty work, all I have to say to him is just to stand out of the way and let us go on to its accomplishment, for we shall pass through or over all opposing obstacles.

Do not tell me that we are lowering the country. God knows the country has been lifted from out the depths up a thousand leagues toward heaven within the last five years. This nation is infinitely higher in the estimation of all the Christian and civilized nations than at any other period of its history. Whoever writes the history of this era must record that the only statesmen in America of this age were the anti-slavery men. Whoever writes of these events, greater and grander than those of any other period of the world's history, will write that no people did more, sacrificed more, poured out more blood, expended more treasure, organized more of the humanities and charities of Christian civilization for the alleviation of distress, or made a nobler record; and he will record the fact that our public men, weak, personally, as they are, and faulty as they are, have comprehended the condition of the country, the duties of the hour, and moving with the eternal forces, have won victories for humanity that will send their names down along the ages forever.

Sir, where is the name of Abraham Lincoln today? Slow sometimes to act, but always looking and working in the right direction; maligned, slandered, sneered at, accused by enemies and complained of by doubting friends, who shrank from that glorious deed of emancipation that saved the country, he has left an immortal name in the annals of his country and his race. When he fell under the pistol of the assassin more tears were shed in this country for him than for all the public men who have ever lived on the North American continent; and as the story of his assassination went over the world nations wept for the fall of the foremost man of the nineteenth century. It was because Abraham Lincoln was our leader, the champion of our ideas, that the world wept over his fall. There is not a man among us who, if he had filled that lofty place and been as true as was Abraham Lincoln to our ideas, principles, and policy, but would be mourned by the nations if he had fallen in the conflict. Abraham Lincoln was a good man, but it was because he was the champion of the cause of liberty that all coming generations will remember him and send down his name forever with benedictions. Just in proportion as we individually, and the political organization to which we belong, have been true to our ideas, have we been strong. It has been this hesitation, this timidity, this quibbling that has been a burden for us to carry; and there are more Senators than one upon this floor who knows that we have not only had this great cause of country and freedom to carry through the war, but we have had to carry the weakness of hesitating, halting, and uncertain public men upon our shoulders. I do not say that we have had to carry the Senator from Pennsylvania, for he did not go at all; he neither took himself nor let us carry him; he was not much of a burden to us and not much of a stop in our way in the past, and he will not be in the future. He was not of us; he is not of us now, or he would not rise here and utter these sneers about the negro's heel and the negro's leg. The negro may not have so fine a leg as the Senator from Pennsylvania, but there are many negroes who have hearts quite as good as is the heart of that Senator; and I know some of them with brains quite as capacious and quite as well trained as his own. Sir, it is time for men who rally around the standard of the great Union Republican party of the country to understand that this Christian people, with their keen sensibilities, their broad humanities, and their ripe intelligence—for there is combined in the Republican party a degree of intelligence and character never before associated in any political organization—do not want their feelings wounded by these vulgar sneers at a poor, oppressed race, which has been kept down for centuries, wronged and outraged. The Senator from Pennsylvania should understand that the man who trifles with the sentiments and the manly sympathies of the American people is not likely either to lead them or to control them in the future.

I wish to say nothing unkind of the members of the Democratic party, but where are they to-day? Why are they in a minority in Congress? Why are they only able to control little Delaware and Kentucky, and not know how long they will keep either? That party was once the champion of the common people of the country, of the poor and lowly, and turned its back upon them; and the man who turns his back upon a poor black man, and allows him to be trampled under the foot of the oppressor, will turn his back on the white man, and let him be trampled under foot. It is this abandonment of the poor and oppressed which has brought that once powerful organization to defeat and sorrow. We shall, I trust, never fall in that way, for I have undoubting faith that we shall accomplish our Heaven-assigned work.

The Senator talks as though he knew all about these questions pertaining to slavery and slaves, and as though the men who have been studying them for twenty-five years, who have traveled one hundred thousand or one hundred and fifty thousand miles, and spoken to a thousand or fifteen hundred audiences on questions touching the cause of liberty in America, do not know anything about a cause to which they have devoted years of unselfish labor. I was sorry to hear such a thought uttered in the speech of my friend from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH;] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has often indulged in the assumption that anti-slavery veterans knew less of slavery and the slaves than himself. I think we know quite as much about slaves and slavery as that Senator. I will relate a little incident which will show that we understand the black men quite as well as that Senator, though he was nurtured in the lap of slavery.

I remember here on one occasion, I think it was during the last session, the Senator from Delaware came to me, said that his negro man, a most excellent man, a man for whom he had the greatest affection, had been drafted, and it would cost him some $900 to get a substitute, and he asked me to see the Secretary of War, and if possible to get him to release his man. The Secretary of War thought he ought not to release so good a man, so the Senator raised $900, obtained a substitute for his dear friend, the slave, and that slave the next week ran away to Pennsylvania, where he enlisted and took the bounty. [Laughter.] The Senator told us the other day that Delaware was the last slave State, and that he was the last slave holder. Now, to vindicate the truth of history, I want to know if that runaway of his was the last slave. The Senator shakes his head. I give this illustration to show how little the Senator knew his intimate friend. We have been told all through this war, "You do not know these people." Gentlemen tell us so now, and they keep telling it. The records of this country will show that we have not made a prediction on this floor for the last five years that has not been verified by the event. We have not taken a position or given a vote here that has not been sanctioned by the voice of the American people, and our position is impregnable, because we stand upon the solid rock of ages, with eternal truths around and about us to sustain us in our weakness and bear us onward, while we see these other lofty gentlemen who know so much about the Constitution, and who are continually invoking it as a pretext how not to do anything, making false prophecies, trembling and straggling along our line of march. We move as the solid and compact columns of a great army move, and they very much like the stragglers that hover on the flank and rear.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I shall be obliged to apologize for not being able to attain to that sublime height of bragging which has characterized the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, but I will endeavor to state if I can a few plain facts for his consideration and that of the Senate. Of course, I have nothing to say with regard to myself. My course here has been open, and I trust without any concealment. It was never very difficult for the Senator to understand exactly where I was. I believe, however, I may say that, in advance of him, I was the first man to say upon this floor that, in going down South to suppress the rebellion, it was perfectly proper that we should treat the negro precisely as any other man—if he was an enemy shoot him; if he was a friend, use him; and that was as far as I intended to go.

But the Senator asserts here in the face of the Senate, and in the face of the American people, that he and his compeers, forsooth, the Anti-Slavery Society, have destroyed slavery; that it is their work; that it is the result of their twenty-five years of toil and struggle; that it is the result of their agitation and their speechifying and their extensive knowledge of the negro and the negro character, and he relates some incidents. I am not very much in the habit of relating incidents, but I will state one for the benefit of the honorable Senator. Somebody was talking about him and his society the other day, and stated that they had "negro on the brain." Some one who was by said, "Well, that may be; but they have not much brain on the negro," [laughter,] and that, I think, Mr. President, is about the truth of it.

Who destroyed slavery, Mr. President? Had the Anti-Slavery Society any agency in it? Did the Anti-Slavery Society or its representatives upon this floor at the outset of this war declare that they were going to destroy slavery? No, sir; but crouching behind their shields at that time they resolved unanimously here that they were not going to destroy slavery, that they were going to make war to support the Constitution and the laws. How long ago was that? Two days after the battle of Bull Run, and the starch was all out of the Anti-Slavery Society; it had not a boast; it had not a threat; but, as I said before, creeping down behind its shield, it said to the country, along with us who were honest in our utterances in that resolution, that it made war for the Constitution and the laws.

I ask you, Mr. President, if the secessionists of the South, in their great madness, in their rage, only akin to this northern rage, its antipodes, had not made war upon the Government of the United States, would slavery have been destroyed? Would all the battle of the Anti-Slavery Society and all its tracts and all its preachings and all its sermonizings in the world have ever achieved that great result if it had not been for the folly and madness of the secessionists of the South who went to war? Let the honorable Senator stand square up and look that fact in the face. He had war at his elbow. Who fought the war? Does the Anti-Slavery Society say that if the Army of the United States had not achieved victory after victory, had not suppressed the rebellion, slavery would not have been abolished? Who then was it that abolished slavery? The gentlemen who talked or the gentlemen who acted? The Senators who wielded tongue and pen, or the hard-headed and hard-handed soldiers who wielded the saber and bayonet? Let the country answer. I would like the honorable Senator to go out and tell our war-worn soldiers who won this victory.

And a word now as to his course and mine upon this floor. I tell him to-day that he and his set were really—I do not say they intended it—the allies of the rebellion; they were its main support and strength; and when Jefferson Davis comes to make his dying confession, if I should chance to beat his elbow, I should want him, in that last moment, when the truth comes to be told, to tell who it was that gathered the whole South to a man around the standard of rebellion; who it was that down there infused the bitterness into that fight which characterized it from end to end; who it was that enabled that weak people to make such a tremendous struggle as that the world never saw the like of it, and I will tell you who he will say it was. He will tell you that when he started he had not half the people about him; he will tell you that the secessionists of the South who went into that rebellion were not half of the people. Who, then, drove the other half to him? The self-same Anti-Slavery Society that, when we had the cannon roaring and the saber clashing and the bayonet thrusting, and the work going on, could not keep its tongue, and must be making the people of the South believe that the war, instead of being for the Constitution and the laws, was to abolish slavery. What then? If we had friends at the outstart of the struggle, we lost them then.

Now, Mr. President, I ask again, who fought this battle? I tell him that it was the Army of the United States that killed the Percy. It was the Army of the United States that met this Hotspur of the rebellion, while the Anti-Slavery Society was down upon the field of battle looking out from under its shield and claiming the Constitution and the laws. But now, sir, now after the victory is achieved, after the battle is won, you will never meet a member of the Anti-Slavery Society who has not this dead Hotspur upon his back, carrying him out and pretending that he killed him. [Laughter.] And almost every one of them is saying, "If your father will do me any honor so; if not, let him kill the next Percy himself. I look to be either earl or duke, I can assure you." That is the language of this party after the battle is over and the victory won. By the by, they do not give us the same assurance that fat John did, for said he, "If I do grow great, I'll grow less; for I'll purge, and leave sack, and live cleanly as a nobleman should do." But, Mr. President, instead of when growing great, growing less, they are swollen to such enormous dimensions under the pressure of this thing which they suppose they have achieved that they are now well nigh to bursting. The honorable Senator says they are going on; yes, and let everybody get out of the road. That may do for people who can be frightened; but that party has not been given to frightening anybody heretofore, that I am aware of. It is exceedingly fertile in abuse; it never undertakes to meet a man's argument except by ridicule and by sneers, and by all that kind of machinery which a weak man always uses against a stronger.

The honorable Senator may go on in his course, and we will go on in our course. We think that instead of his having had to carry us through the rebellion we have had to carry him; that if there was any load we had it to bear. I do not undertake to say that the honorable Senator did not intend well enough; but he has put himself out of the pale of receiving the benefit of that apology which might be made in his favor, by assailing the intentions of others. Who made him a judge and a ruler over Israel? Who authorized him to say that I despised the laboring man? I think I could prove by good witnesses that I have done such days of hard work as that Senator would have hardly survived. And when he talks about me or the gentlemen with whom I associate here as not being the friends of the poor and the friends of the humble he speaks without the book. By what right does he arraign me as not desiring the prosperity and the greatness of this country? Is it not my country as well as his? Have I not as many interests at stake as he has, or any other man? Sir, when a speech requires such make-weights as that to extend it over a period of fifteen minutes, it had better not be made at all. Hereafter, when a question is before this body, and is to be met, I hope the question will be argued, and the question alone.

I have raised a simple question of constitutional law; and the Senator says that the Constitution has been dinned in his ears for five years. Yes, Mr. President, and you might din it in for twenty, and I doubt whether he would appreciate a single principle which is involved in it. Is the Constitution to be nothing? Is the oath we have taken to support it to be nothing? Is constitutional learning to be sneered out of this Chamber? Is a conscientious desire on the part of a Senator to do his duty as a man should do it, and to carry out in spirit and in truth that duty which has been intrusted to him by his constituents, here to be made a subject of reproach upon this floor. And is a man not to be supposed to be orthodox, not to be supposed to be patriotic, unless he believes in all the vagaries and all the whims and the ethnology of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts who has traveled, I suppose, over one hundred and fifty thousand miles, and has made some twelve or fifteen hundred abolition speeches? I cannot tell how much a man would know after he had made twelve or fifteen hundred speeches on one side, at one end of a house, where there was nobody to reply to him; I think he would become so confirmed in his crotchets and so full of his absurdities by that time that it would be utterly impossible to teach him anything afterward.

Who arrogated to themselves superior knowledge of the negroes? We did not; but I have and do again arrogate for the men of the South who live among them, who live with them, a knowledge of the negroes and of negro character superior to that of a man who lives in a New England State, and sees a negro once perhaps in three weeks or a month. I should think it most extraordinary if such were not the case.

Mr. President, I come back again now to the question before the Senate. It is simply this, whether, in the first place, we have authority to create this bureau with this jurisdiction at all; and the question that arises upon the amendment which I have moved is whether we have a right to extend it into the loyal States. It may be said, I know, that it is to be extended there simply for the relief of the freedmen. I say that the freedmen of Pennsylvania ask no relief from the Freedmen's Bureau. Pennsylvania relieves her own destitute and her own poor. She is not a pensioner upon the United States Government for any favors of that kind. I say, too, that if it is to extend beyond relief, and to administer municipal law there for the benefit of the freedmen, Pennsylvania administers her own municipal law, enforces her own police regulations between those who inhabit her borders, and she does not desire any such contrivance as this, but would rather repudiate it and spew it out of her mouth.

Mr. President, I am aware, and I have long been aware, that it is of no use here with certain Senators to appeal to the Constitution. I know that it is of no use to appeal to the past construction which has been put upon that instrument. I know that there are Senators who think certain things ought to be done, and no matter what barrier stands in the way they think they are doing God service when they overleap it. When war was raging over one half of the Republic, when it required all the energies of the loyal portion of the Union to sustain that war and to support the soldiers in the field, I have often kept silent, and have not, as often as I would otherwise have done, raised my voice against these violations of the Constitution. Now I propose to give a notice as well as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and it is that from henceforth I will resist as long as I can, in my humble way, every measure, no matter what it may be, that I believe to be a violation of the fundamental law of this nation, and which to me is sacred as the will of the American people. Sir, what is that Constitution but the exponent, the embodiment, of the will of the American people? Think of it, sir; packed into this small volume [exhibiting a copy of the Constitution] is the will of thirty million people; not the will of a party, not the will of a faction, but the will of all parties, the unanimous will of the American people. Who dares violate a provision of it? Who dares thrust in his will instead of that will? Who so arrogant as to assume that they will substitute their will for this great will, which is to be our guide and our rule of action in this body? Gentlemen talk of the right, and of God being with the right, and all that kind of thing; and yet they forget this sacred truth, that here is our letter of attorney, here is our warrant for what we do, here is our authority in the premises, and the man who goes a step beyond it, the man who violates it, is guilty before that God, to whom the gentleman appeals with such facility, of perjury.

The gentleman assumes that God is on their side, and that God is with them. So might a man assume that God was with him when he acquiesced in anything that took place in the universe. I suppose the gentleman will hardly deny that whatever does take place in the universe, takes place in accordance with the will of God, as a whole. He is omnipotent, and it must beso. Whoever acquiesces in the decrees of destiny can very well boast that God is with him of course; but short-sighted, finite mortals as we are, not knowing what destiny is to be in the future, are not authorized in making any such boasts.

Mr. President, I hope that the operation of this bill may be circumscribed, if it is to become a law, to the States lately in rebellion, as those are the only States over whom we can have a shadow of pretense for exercising this right, which must be a belligerent right, if it is any right at all. I can conceive how men might suppose that, owing to the fact of the previous belligerency, this bill would be demanded by a certain state of things there; I can conceive how any one might be misled into that error; but I cannot see how anybody can imagine that there is a right existing in this Government to extend the operation of such a bill over States which never were in rebellion, and which never did occupy an attitude of belligerency toward the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senator will allow me a few moments to reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was in hopes—

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir, I yield very reluctantly, for I was in hopes that we would go on with the bill, avoiding this general discussion.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania tells us that he, in the future, more than he has in the past, shall resist certain measures here. I have not a doubt of what he will do in the future, and I have not any doubt but that the same result will happen in the future as has happened in the past, that his counsels will not be the counsels of the Senate.

The Senator invokes the Constitution. Every time a question came up here touching slavery or slaves we had his interpretation of the Constitution dinned into our unwilling ears. I take it, we are quite as capable of interpreting the Constitution, or of understanding it, as the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not know what right he has to come into this Chamber and make pretensions to interpret that instrument to other Senators. It is not the Constitution that we object to; we believe in that quite as much as the Senator from Pennsylvania; but it is to that Senator's construction of the Constitution to which we object. The Senate has not believed in it in the past, and I venture to say it will not be guided by it in the future. What right has that Senator to rise here to-day, as he has done, and hold the Constitution of his country in his hand, and speak to us as though he was a Marshall, a Story, or a Webster, and that we were children to sit at his feet and accept without hesitation his construction of the Constitution? I do not acknowledge such a right on his part. He is not my teacher, nor the teacher of the rest of us. He has his opinions. I am ever ready to give to those opinions due consideration; but when he comes into the Senate and arraigns the rest of us for want of fidelity to our oaths, I ask him by what authority he does it. God and nature never intended that he should teach the Senate of the United States as one having authority.

But the Senator is pleased to tell us that during this war he has had to carry us along. He carry us along! Why, sir, there is hardly a measure that we have advocated during the war that received his sanction.

The Senator talks about the anti-slavery societies. I said nothing of anti-slavery societies. I spoke of that great organization rallying around living ideas that made Abraham Lincoln President of the United States in 1860 and again in 1864. Ninety-nine out of every hundred of the men of that organization think as we think here, and have been with us through the war, and are with us now. When we hesitate, they are behind us pointing out the path of duty and bidding us walk therein.

The Senator tells us that the soldiers put down this rebellion; of course they put down the rebellion. We put one hundred and eighty thousand black men into the field to help them to do it. The Senator opposed it; he thought that putting arms in the hands of black men would weaken us. In fact, nearly all the great leading measures to weaken slavery and to strengthen the country were opposed by the Senator; and he tells us now that if he were to stand by the side of Jeff. Davis in his dying hour, Davis would whisper into his ear that it was this anti-slavery sentiment, this opposition to slavery here, that banded together his men in the South and enabled him to continue the contest. We have heard that assertion often enough, and there is not the shadow of a shade of truth or reason in it. It served its purpose, and it is quite time it was abandoned. Every vote given in this Senate, every act passed by Congress that weakened slavery or emancipated a slave, weakened the rebellion and strengthened the country; and history will so pronounce. That is the verdict of the nation to-day, and the Senator himself may think so at sometime; I hope he will advance far enough along for that. Sir, you will find that just as the idea pervaded the rebel States that slavery was a lost institution, just in that proportion they gave up the hope of triumph and yielded.

Let me say to the Senator that if he should stand by the side of Jeff. Davis at his dying hour, if he should be Davis's confessor, and Davis should make a confession of that character, the great rebel will be more mistaken than he has been in all the six past years of his life, which have been one grand mistake. There is not a semblance of truth in it. It was only on Saturday evening that one of the most learned men of the South came to see me, and he gave me this statement: believing in secession, believing in slavery, he left the country, stopped for a time in one of the West India islands on his way to Canada. He found the freedmen there living comfortably, and he began to change his opinion about emancipation. He went to Halifax. There he found the colored people free and prosperous, and he became impressed with the fact that these people could prosper in freedom. He came to this conclusion, and he went to Richmond, after his return home, and urged upon the government that as slavery was to go down there was no need of the war continuing any longer; that the object for which they were fighting was lost; that if slavery was a lost cause, there ought not to be two nations on this continent. That statement of the distinguished gentleman, who is known throughout the country for his learning and accomplishments, is the statement of a truth that pervaded the whole southern mind. They went into rebellion to make slavery eternal; they found that by our legislation, by our determination, by the policy of the Administration, which the Senator from Pennsylvania generally opposed, slavery was perishing, that it was to go down, and then they realized that the cause of the confederacy was lost, and they had better give up the hopeless contest.

I remember being in the room of Mr. Lincoln when an eminent American just returned from abroad was presented to him. He said to Mr. Lincoln, "I have spent many months in England and France, and I come to tell you that your proclamation of emancipation has prevented the recognition of the confederacy by England and France." Mr. Lincoln replied, "I know that to be true." And yet that great measure, that prevented the recognition of the confederacy by those two powerful nations; that great measure that strengthened us in Europe beyond human calculation; that great measure that struck the first great blow at this rebellion, was opposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania and these gentlemen who undertake to arraign us now and to arrest the consummation of the great work of complete emancipation. I say to you, sir, what is true, that we who have stood by this policy of destroying slavery after slavery had raised its bloody hand against our country, we who broke it down wherever we could reach it, contributed, as far as legislation could go, and as far as the public voice could go, to weaken the rebellion and strengthen the country. And our brave soldiers in the field, partaking of our spirit, believing as we believed, four fifths of them believing in the cause of liberty, trampled the rebellion down under the iron heel of war. If we had had no rebellion we should have had now no emancipation; but, sir, it was the sentiment of the country, of the Christian men of the country, the men who love liberty, standing up and resisting the aggressive policy of slavery, which made that war of ideas that finally came to the war of arms, and in the contest the country has been made a free country and slavery has perished forever. There are evils now to be corrected; there are rights to be secured; and it is our duty, the country and God impose it upon us, to do in the future as in the past, to take the amplest guarantees for the liberties of the poor, the weak, and the lowly, and the amplest guarantees for the security of the future peace and glory of our country.

Although the Senator speaks of the intense spirit of hatred toward the South, I say, for myself, and I would say it if I were in the presence of Almighty God, that I never had one sentiment of hostility or hatred toward the people of the rebel States, not even during this bloody war. I have looked upon Davis and his accomplices as the mere hands of the rebellion. I have believed slavery to be its brain, its heart, its soul. Standing as the advocate of human rights, as one of the humblest of the men who were upholding their country and the cause of liberty, I have felt charity toward those people; and all I ask of them now is security for the future. I want universal justice, universal liberty, and then I am for amnesty to all. I would—I say it in all conscience here to-day—have those rebel States speedily come back again and fill these seats with their chosen leaders, and although they might not vote with me, or love me, or love what I love, I would trust to the future, to the healing influence of time, and I will meet them everywhere with kindness and treat them as I would erring brethren of my Father's household. But, sir, I insist upon it, the country will insist upon it, that we shall not peril one single right of the poorest man that treads the soil of the country. This position I shall maintain; for I would rather have the thanks of one poor black boy away down in the depths of Carolina, that I may never see and never know, than to receive the compliments of the proudest man in the land who would take away or impair the rights of the poorest of the sons or daughters of toil.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts, in the course of his remarks, said that I had made two admissions, as if I had done something that was inadvertent. I expressed nothing but my sentiments and what I believe must necessarily be the judgment of all the profession who will take the pains to examine the Constitution of the United States, as it has been lately amended, and its effect upon the existing institution of slavery and the existing law of the States in relation to it. The Constitution of the United States now abolishes slavery. That Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and it sweeps away everything that interferes with the great right of freedom which it now secures, and the legislation of every State of the Union, and even of Congress, in opposition to it would fall as soon as it was enacted. That is the effect of the constitutional amendment.

But, sir, I have been a little astonished at the extreme measures that have been brought up here under the pretext of making the constitutional amendment effective. What can be more effective than the national will expressed in the Constitution? What legislation is needed to aid and assist it? It is said it contains no punitive act, no act punishing its violation, that no penalty is prescribed for its violation. Every act under an unconstitutional law infringing upon the rights of individuals, whether white or black, is null and void. Holding this doctrine, believing it to be the true doctrine, and that none other can possibly be true, what is the use of our declaring and legislating those laws void which the Constitution of the United States has made void; and what kind of respect will the people suppose we pay to the Constitution when we are making an act in aid of it, to destroy or repeal that which has already been destroyed and fallen before it? There was no inadvertence in the admission that I made, because I hold to it just as strongly as I hold to any doctrine that I acquire in the study of the Constitution and the study of the profession to which I once belonged.

The other admission I will not comment upon. I believed it was true. All history will justify it; and I believe when the history of this country and of the effects of the legislation that may follow this rebellion shall come to be written, it will be verified again.

The gentleman has made one admission which does him great honor. He says that he entertains no hatred or ill-feeling against the South; that he wants no more blood and no more confiscation. That sentiment does honor to him as a Senator; it does honor to him as a man. But pardon me for remarking that I have seen it nowhere in his movements for legislation toward the South, nor have I seen it come from any of his party. I intend to cast no reproach upon gentlemen. They act according to their convictions and their sense of duty.

There is only one other remark that I desire to make. The Senator spoke of the Democratic party as representing only Kentucky and the little State of Delaware. It is true we are in a small minority in the Senate, but there are eleven of us here of the old stripe, and we have faith in its doctrines and that it will rise again. We are not claiming anything for its past virtues or its past triumphs; but we believe that that party that stands up, not only for national rights according to the Constitution, but for State rights, too, according to the Constitution, and preserving this Government according to the principles of the great men who made it, will be considered and will come into power again. Gentlemen should reflect that in the recent presidential election the candidates of the Democratic party polled eighteen hundred thousand votes in spite of all the advantages that the Government candidates possessed. Sir, the Democratic party is not dead, though we are at present suspended. Let me recall to the mind of the Senator that Napoleon Bonaparte, when he was dominating all over Europe and playing with crowns, made a small mistake when he tempted the snows of Russia in winter time; and there may be a time when the party now in power will go too far; the party which by this bill invades the rights of the loyal States, and puts into the hands of the officers of this bureau powers that should be placed in the hands of no man. Under it an agent of this Freedmen's Bureau is to declare just what law he pleases, and administer it just as he pleases, and there is no appeal. One of the agents of this bureau on coming into Kentucky declared that if any former owner of slaves, after the men had been taken into the Army or gone off, leaving no one but the old and infirm, who were unable to work, and the children, should refuse to support them, and that, too, whether he had anything to support them or not, he would seize their property, confiscate it, and turn it to the public use! Do you think that is acceptable to Kentucky? Do you think it would be acceptable to any set of people? Here you authorize one of these agents to arrest any man; whether the evidence be little or great he is the sole judge, without perhaps having any legal or judicial knowledge, and he fines and imprisons at his pleasure. You propose to impose upon the free people of Kentucky this kind of a judiciary and this kind of laws, and you think it will be a great evidence of our want of loyalty if we do not cheerfully accept it.

Sir, I never supposed that the majority of this Senate did not mean to pass this bill and the one that is to follow it, that have been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, the best legal minds in the body. They assume that it is a necessity, and therefore constitutional in their view. But, sir, I did hope that Kentucky would be exempted from its operation; that this last cup of bitterness and trial would not be put to the lips of a State that had suffered as much as Kentucky by her loyalty to the Union.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot.) The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Cowan.]
Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Stockton—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—83.

ABSENT—Messrs. Dixon, Doolittle, Harris, Norton, and Wright—5.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the bill by striking out all of the second section after the word "class" in the fifteenth line, in the following words:

And the President of the United States, through the War Department and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employes, agents, and officers of this bureau.

The sole object of that provision is to suppress wholly the jurisdiction and the action of the courts, Federal or State, in all the States that may come into conflict with the operations of this bureau. We have in all the States Federal district courts; we have State courts. This bill embodies a great deal of judicial power, and all this judicial power it invests in this bureau, in the commissioners to be appointed by the President, or in military officers who are assigned to the performance of those duties. I ask the honorable Senator who reported this bill, by what warrant does he subject not only the jurisdiction and action of the State courts, but of the Federal courts, to this Freedmen's Bureau; and in the conflict of authority between the bureau and the Federal or State courts, by what warrant of power does he provide that "the President of the United States, through the War Department and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employes, agents, and officers of this bureau?" There are other sections of the bill upon which I shall comment as they are called up by offering amendments to them. The bill creates judicial powers; it authorizes the construction of cases between citizens of the United States, if the negroes are citizens, between a white man and a negro; and these cases, that appertain, according to the Constitution of the United States, to the judicial power of the Government exclusively, are vested, or attempted to be vested, by this bill, in the Commissioner, assistant commissioners, and agents of this bureau; and if the courts, Federal or State, are invoked to give the protection of the Constitution and the laws to a white man who is a party to one of these controversies, the assistant commissioner or agent deciding against the white man, and a conflict of jurisdiction arises between the bureau and the courts, State or Federal, the President is authorized by the clause which I move to strike out to extend military jurisdiction and protection to all the assistant commissioners and agents of this bureau who are deciding against the Constitution, against the law, and to the prejudice of the white citizen. I enter my protest against the interposition of the military power for any such purpose. It is directed by this clause to be invoked and to operate for the utter subversion of the courts of the States in the trial of judicial questions between the people of those States. I therefore move that that portion of the bill be stricken out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The words proposed to be stricken out confer no such judicial authority at all. They simply put the officers and employes of the Freedmen's Bureau under the military jurisdiction and protection. They are placed in the same situation as the officers and soldiers of the Army. Does the Senator from Kentucky understand that in a time of peace, and where the courts are in operation, officers and soldiers of the Army are not amenable to the judicial authorities, both Federal and State? Suppose a soldier or an officer in the Army before this war, or in any of the States where judicial authority has not been interfered with, commits a crime upon any citizen of any State, will he not be indicted in the State courts if it is a violation of a State law, or in the Federal courts if it is in violation of a law of the United States, for the offense, and tried in the court and punished if he be found guilty, just the same as if he were not an officer or a soldier? All that is meant by this clause is simply that the officers and agents of the bureau shall be under the military jurisdiction. In those sections of country where civil authority is not restored, whence the United States courts have been expelled, and where justice cannot be administered in consequence of resistance to the law, where the military power bears sway, of course they cannot be tried in the courts; there are no courts there to try them; it is preposterous to think of appealing to judicial tribunals where there are no judicial tribunals; but wherever judicial tribunals exist and the civil authority is maintained, officers and soldiers are amenable to them for offenses just the same as other citizens, and always have been. They are subject to the Rules and Articles of War, and may be governed by the military power, but for any violations of State law or United States law outside of the Army regulations they are amenable to the civil authority.

Mr. DAVIS. I will inquire of the honorable Senator if this bill does not vest judicial powers in the assistant commissioners and the agents under it, and whether it is in the competence of Congress by the passage of a law to confer a part of the judicial power of the Government upon such officers? The honorable Senator says that this section is intended to operate in the States where there are no courts, if I understand him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir. I say that these officers and employes are put under the military authority wherever they may be, and become subject to the Rules and Articles of War; but I say they are not protected in the violation of local law, and would still be amenable to the courts where the courts are in operation and have not been disturbed by the rebellion.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, we will test that presently; but that is not the effect and meaning of the bill as it is printed. These assistant commissioners and these agents take jurisdiction of all contests between the freed negro and the man that hires him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will allow me, the bill expressly confines that jurisdiction to rebellious territory, where the military authority prevails, and by its terms expressly excludes any such jurisdiction whenever the rebellious territory, or States which have been in rebellion, are restored in their constitutional relations to the Government. If he will read the latter part of the eighth section, he will find that the only judicial authority conferred by the bill is in that section, and there it is declared that—

The jurisdiction conferred by this section on the officers and agents of this bureau to cease and determine whenever the discrimination on account of which it is conferred ceases, and in no event to be exercised in any State in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has not been interrupted by the rebellion, nor in any such State after said State shall have been fully restored in all its constitutional relations to the United States, and the courts of the State and of the United States within the same are not disturbed or stopped in the peaceable course of justice.

That is the only judicial authority conferred by the whole bill on the Freedmen's Bureau, and it is expressly limited in its terms. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will see that the position that he assumes is not in the bill. He may object to it. I wish he could agree to it; I should be very happy to have his cooperation; but if I cannot, I hope he will not fight against it for something that is not in it.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not understand this bill as the honorable Senator does; and I think before we get through with it I shall demonstrate that he and myself will have a conflict of opinion in relation to this very matter upon other parts of the bill; but I limit my objection at present to this section. Now, sir, what is the effect of the provision which I propose to strike out?

And the President of the United States, through the War Department and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction over the employes, agents, and officers of this bureau.

Are the "employes, agents, and officers of this bureau" a part of the Army?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I say they are not. The bill does not make them so. It makes them anything else but a part of the Army. The bill makes them civil officers, and it invests them with judicial powers and judicial functions, and with the faculty of passing judgment and executing that judgment between the citizens of the United States. It is in the performance of these functions that the Senator has so framed his bill as to authorize the President of the United States to protect the assistant commissioners and agents in the exercise of these judicial functions in passing their judgments and in enforcing their judgments. I say it is not competent, and it is dangerous and wrong, that any branch of the magistracy—you may call them judges, you may call them assistant commissioners under the Freedmen's Bureau, or you may call them agents under the Freedmen's Bureau—that are invested with judicial powers and with the function to pass in judgment upon the rights of citizens, shall have the power to invoke the military to uphold their unconstitutional and usurped authority. Sir, the whole jurisdiction with which this bill attempts to invest the bureau is in direct conflict with the Constitution; it is unconstitutional; it invests the bureau with judicial powers when the Constitution itself partitions the powers of the Government and assigns the judicial power to another branch exclusively, to the courts established by the Constitution and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish. My position is that no Department, no magistracy under our Government can exercise judicial functions and powers unless it be a part of the judicial branch of the Government; that this bureau in its assistant commissioners and in its agents is clothed with judicial power; that this is an unconstitutional and void investment of power; and for the purpose of enabling this magistracy to maintain themselves in the exercise of this void and unconstitutional investment of judicial power, this provision, which I propose to strike out, authorizes the military power of the country to be interposed, and in that sense I move to strike out the clause. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment. We may as well have them now as in the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Stockton—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Cresswell, Dixon, Doolittle, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Williams, and Wright—10.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to suggest to the chairman of the committee—I will not move it if he has any objection to it—whether it would not be well to amend that section, in order to exclude a conclusion that might be drawn from it. I do not know that it would have any very particular legal effect; perhaps the effect is the same now. The amendment that I suggest is to add to the end of the second section these words:

In the exercise of the duties imposed or authorized by this act and the act to which this is additional.

It strikes me it would have a good effect in taking away an argument that might be used with reference to it by others.

Mr. WADE. How would the clause read then?

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I propose to amend it, it would read:

And the President of the United States, through the War Department and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employees, agents, and officers of this bureau in the exercise of the duties imposed or authorized by this act and the act to which this is additional.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that there is any objection to that amendment, except that it might subject these officers to be harassed in some way by local legislation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They cannot be harassed in that way while in the exercise of the duties of their office.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No; of course no local legislation could interfere with this law. I shall not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to strike out the whole of the second section of the bill, if that motion is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, with the approval of the President, shall divide each district into a number of sub-districts, not to exceed the number of counties or parishes in each State, and shall assign to each sub-district at least one agent, either a citizen, officer of the Army, or enlisted man, who, if an officer, shall serve without additional compensation or allowance, and if a citizen or enlisted man, shall receive a salary not exceeding $1,500 per annum; and such agent shall, before entering on the duties of his office, take the oath prescribed in the first section of the act to which this is an amendment. Each assistant commissioner may employ not exceeding six clerks, one of the third class and five of the first class, and each agent of a sub-district may employ two clerks of the first class. And the President of the United States, through the War Department and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employees, agents, and officers of this bureau in the exercise of the duties imposed and authorized by this act and the act to which this is additional.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As I propose to-morrow to say something upon the merits of the bill, provided the final vote shall not be taken this afternoon, I will state very briefly now the objection to this particular section.

If there is one thing certain about this bill, it is that it is to have operation throughout the whole of the United States. That being so, let us consider for one moment the vast powers conferred under this section upon this Freedmen's Bureau. I do not say that it was the intention of the honorable framer of the bill, or of any of its friends, that such vast powers should be used, but I say that the bill itself gives authority for the exercise of such powers, and when we look into this section particularly we shall see the vastness of these powers.

The first section provides for the appointment of a Commissioner of freedmen with a salary of $3,000, the same as under the original bill. It says that this act shall be operative throughout the United States, and then it authorizes the President of the United States to divide up the whole number of States into districts, not to exceed the number of twelve, and it gives an assistant commissioner for each district, with the same pay that was prescribed by the act to which this is an amendment. The second section of the bill provides that each district may be divided into sub-districts, not to exceed the number of parishes or counties in a State; each under an agent with a salary of $1,500. What is the executive power which this section confers? What are the number of counties in the United States, provided the President of the United States wishes to make an appointment in every county of the United States? A few years ago the number of those counties—and I suppose they have not decreased—was one thousand six hundred and seventy-six.

Mr. DAVIS. There are one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, with the new States that have been admitted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My friend says that there are one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven. Are we to stop and say, as an answer to this objection, that the President of the United States will not appoint an agent in every one of the counties in the whole United States? What authority have we for any such assumption? All I say now is that this bill confers the power upon the President to appoint an agent in every county of the United States, if he chooses; to divide the States into twelve districts, and then sub-divide those districts and appoint an agent for every county. It is folly, it is madness, to say that no Executive will do that. It is no answer to the objection if the bill confers the power. These agents are to have clerks. Each one is to have two clerks. This section, when you come to analyze it, gives seventy-two clerks of assistant commissioners, and it will give three thousand three hundred and forty-two clerks of agents. This bill will give you, in officers to be appointed under this Freedmen's Bureau, a Commissioner at $3,000 a year, twelve assistant commissioners at $3,000 each, making $36,000; one thousand six hundred and seventy-six agents, at $1,500 each, if they are taken from among citizens—and the bill authorizes the appointment of citizens—which will amount to $2,510,000; it gives seventy-two clerks of assistant commissioners at $1,200 each, making $86,400; it gives three thousand four hundred and forty-two clerks of agents, as I stated before, with a salary of $1,200 each, amounting to $4,674,800; making the actual cost of this bureau for the pay of officers, in case the President of the United States chooses, under the authority given him in this bill to divide the States into twelve districts, and then to divide those districts into sub-districts, each district representing a county, $7,314,200. I offer this amendment to get clear of this enormous expenditure; and when the bill confers this power I do not accept, as an answer to my objection, that it will not be so operated. The power to so operate it is in the bill itself. I therefore move to strike out that entire section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMEROY in the chair) put the question on the amendment, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that we are now in Committee of the Whole, and we can take the yeas and nays upon his amendment in the Senate. I have no objection, however, to taking them now if he desires it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not wish to delay action, and I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have given the Senate my views about this bill, and will not propose any amendment with a view to complicate the measure; but there is one section to which the objection, in my judgment, is so very clear that I will move to strike it out. It is the sixth section, which confers upon the bureau the power to buy lands for homes for the refugees and freedmen and for asylums and schools. I think the constitutional objection to that section is so very clear that I feel it my duty to move to strike it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is obliged to inform the Senator that the record shows that that section has been adopted in committee, and it is not in order, therefore, to move to strike it out. That motion will be in order in the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir, I believe it was adopted by a general vote.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the fourth section of the bill as amended by striking out after the word "lands," in the fifth line, the words "in Florida, Mississippi, and Arkansas," and in lieu thereof to insert "anywhere in the United States."

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same objection would apply to that amendment as a question of order. The fourth section has been adopted in Committee of the Whole in lieu of another section, and I suppose, therefore, it is not in order to amend it in committee. The Senator can make his motion in the Senate. The section as it stands has been agreed to in committee, and having been so agreed to, I suppose it is not now subject to amendment, I make the suggestion to the Chair; I believe that is the rule.

Mr. DAVIS. It escaped me that the section had been adopted, and I would as soon take the course suggested by the Senator as any other. The Secretary will please preserve the amendment, so that I may offer it again in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment in this stage of the bill is withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIS. A friend suggests to me that we shall have an opportunity in the Senate to offer our amendments. All I want is an opportunity to offer them. If I shall have an opportunity to offer them in the Senate, I would as soon do it there as in committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Undoubtedly any amendment is in order now that the Senator thinks proper to offer, unless it is to a section that has already been adopted; but the whole bill, including the sections which have been adopted in committee, will be open to amendment when the bill shall have been reported to the Senate, and it would hasten its progress if Senators will allow it to be reported to the Senate, and then any amendments will be in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I will acquiesce in that course with the exception of one amendment that I desire to offer as an additional section. I move to insert between the eighth and ninth sections of the bill the following:

And be it further enacted, That from each and every decision between parties made by the Commissioner, or any assistant commissioner, or other officer of this bureau, an appeal or writ of error may be prosecuted to the district or circuit court of the United States for the district in which such decision may have been made; and from the judgment of such district or circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States, by any party or person who may think himself, herself, or themselves aggrieved thereby; and upon such parties or persons entering into bond with good and sufficient security in the office of said court to abide by and perform the final judgment of the matter from which such appeal or writ of error is prosecuted, and to pay such costs and damages as may be awarded to any person or parties by reason of the prosecution of the same, further proceedings shall be suspended until the final judgment of such matter.

I offer this amendment upon the idea that the powers to be executed by this bureau are plainly and simply judicial powers. They are nothing else. They are the decisions of suits between different parties. If I be right in this opinion, as I feel assured that I am, it will present this state of case: that in every question arising and decided under this act there will be no remedy whatever by a supervisory tribunal. The honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary disclaims that there is any judicial power vested in these officers. I shall test that point with the honorable Senator either now or when the bill shall come into the Senate. I shall propose to add an amendment in the form of a proviso declaring that neither the Commissioner nor the assistant commissioners, nor the agents of the bureau, shall exercise any judicial power whatever under the bill. If a provision of that kind were added I would not offer this section.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator misunderstood me if he understood me to say that no judicial power was conferred by this bill. I did not intend to say that.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the amendment now pending for the present, for the purpose of offering the one which I have just suggested, to come in as a proviso to section eight:

Provided, That neither the Commissioner, assistant commissioners, agents, or any officer under this bill, shall exercise any judicial power whatever.

I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; take them in the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays for the purpose of saving time; but I shall offer the amendment again in the Senate, and ask for the yeas and nays upon it then.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to move an executive session; I suppose it is not expected that we can finish this bill this evening.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator allow me before I forget it to insert a couple of words to which I presume there will be no objection, before a vote is taken on the amendments made in committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Perhaps the Senator will indulge the Chair in taking the vote on the question of concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before that is done, I wish to amend one of the amendments made in committee.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Chair that the Senator from Kentucky, and some other Senators, propose to amend those amendments before they are concurred in.

Mr. SUMNER. There is one of the amendments to which I wish to move an amendment in the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In the fifth line of the fourth section, as amended in committee, after the word "Mississippi," I move to insert the words "Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas." The effect of the amendment is simply this: the fourth section, as amended, provides for reserving public lands for the benefit of freedmen and refugees in the States of Florida, Mississippi, and Arkansas, and I propose to add Alabama and Louisiana, having ascertained since the amendment was offered in Committee of the Whole that there are public lands in Alabama and Louisiana as well as the other States named.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 22, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order the calling of States for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to committees, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

DEFENSE OF NORTHEASTERN FRONTIER.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, introduced a bill to provide for the defense of the northeastern frontier; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JENCKES introduced a bill to regulate suffrage and elections in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

COUNTERFEIT UNITED STATES CURRENCY.

Mr. DEMING introduced a bill to prevent the passing of counterfeit United States currency; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REGISTRY OF VESSELS.

Mr. J. M. HUMPHREY introduced a bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to certain vessels; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

APPOINTMENT OF REAR ADMIRAL, ETC.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill to further regulate the appointment of rear admiral, and for the appointment of certain volunteer officers to the regular Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BROOMALL introduced a bill for the establishment of a navy-yard and naval depot on the Delaware river in Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill granting pensions to soldiers of the war of 1812 with Great Britain; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MILLER. I move the reference of the bill to a select committee of three.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I very much dislike to object to anything that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] desires; but I would like to know the particular reason why this bill should not go to the appropriate standing committee.

The SPEAKER. The subject cannot be debated under this call. It is in order to move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. In order to test the sense of the House, I make that motion.

Mr. STEVENS. If it be in order, I should like to ask of the Committee on Invalid Pensions why they have not yet reported the bill which I offered before the holidays, allowing employés of the Government to receive their pensions.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order now. The motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the bill be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

BOUNTIES.

Mr. MILLER also introduced a bill granting bounty to volunteers who entered the Army of the United States in the years 1861 and 1862, for the purpose of putting down the rebellion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MYERS introduced a bill to regulate suffrage in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

MARTHA M'COOK.

Mr. BINGHAM introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Martha McCook; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

EMPLOYÉS IN EXECUTIVE MANSION.

Mr. SPALDING introduced a bill to authorize the President to appoint certain officers of his household and fixing their salaries; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

OATH OF OFFICE.

Mr. FINCK introduced a bill to prescribe the oath of office; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

VIRGINIA LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, introduced a bill allowing the further time of five years to those owning land warrants issued by the State of Virginia to her officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on continental establishment to enter and survey the same; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions;

Joint resolution (S. No. 20) extending the time for the completion of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad;

A bill (S. No. 86) granting the franking privilege to Mary Lincoln; and

A bill (H. R. No. 36) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending 30th June, 1867, with amendments.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. EGGLESTON introduced a bill to amend the judicial system of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

J. AND O. P. COBB AND CO.

Mr. FARQUHAR introduced a joint resolution for the adjustment of the claim of J. & O. P. Cobb & Co., of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

BOUNTY LAND.

Mr. FARNSWORTH introduced an act granting bounty land to officers and soldiers of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, was, by unanimous consent, allowed the privilege hereafter to submit bills which he had in his committee-room.

ADDITIONAL ILLINOIS POST ROUTE.

Mr. COOK introduced a bill to establish a post route from Gardner to Tonica, in the State of Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CALLING OUT NATIONAL FORCES.

Mr. BLOW introduced a bill to define the meaning of the first section of the act entitled

"An act further to regulate and provide for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEWIS J. CUNDIFF.

Mr. NOELL introduced a bill for the relief of Lewis J. Cundiff, of St. Francis county, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

CLAIM OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

PROTECTION OF EMIGRANTS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, introduced a joint resolution relating to the unexpended balances of the $10,000 appropriated for the protection of emigration upon the route from the Missouri river to Gallatin, in Montana, by act approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

POST ROADS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIDWELL introduced a bill to establish certain post roads in the State of California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

AMENDMENT OF JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, introduced a joint resolution amending a joint resolution therein named; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CHAVES introduced a bill attaching all that portion of the Territory of Colorado lying south of the thirty-eighth parallel of north latitude to the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. DENNY introduced a bill amendatory of the organic act of Washington Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

PAYMENT OF UNION PRISONERS.

Mr. DONNELLY introduced a bill making provision for the payment of officers and men of the United States Army, who, by confinement in rebel prisons or otherwise, were prevented from being mustered into the service for some time after their appointment; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NIAGARA FALLS SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, introduced a bill to construct a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. BRADFORD introduced a bill to provide for the admission of Colorado as a State into the Union; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

FIRE DEPARTMENT OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. INGERSOLL introduced a bill concerning the fire department of Washington city; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

TAX ON CIGARS.

Mr. MILLER submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be and are hereby required to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill graduating the tax on cigars manufactured and sold within the United States according to the quality thereof.

GOVERNMENT LOAN TO MEXICO.

Mr. STEVENS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of the United States granting a loan on property security to the republic of Mexico, to enable her to prevent the establishment of a monarchical Government on her soil.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know whether it is proper to say a word in explanation of that resolution now.

The SPEAKER. It is not, nor can the Chair ask unanimous consent during the morning hour, but it must pass under the previous question, or without debate.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I withdraw it. I wanted to explain it.

The resolution was accordingly withdrawn.

STARVATION OF PRISONERS.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That upon the evidence before this nation of the starvation and butchery of its soldiers as prisoners of war in the hands of the late so-called confederate government, and of other violations of the humane usages of nations in that behalf, with the presumed connivance of the executive head of that government and the commander-in-chief of its armies in the field, it has become the duty of the President of the United States to order the trial of those pretended functionaries, and all other officers of that government, civil or military, who are believed to have either authorized or been consenting thereto, before a military commission for a violation of the laws of war, and in case of the conviction of any of them, to execute the sentence of such tribunals by inflicting such punishment as may be adjudged by them appropriate to the offense.

That under the special circumstances of the case, the arraignment of any of the leaders of the rebellion for the crime of treason before any of the judicial tribunals of the country, besides being of questionable propriety in itself after so long a maintenance of the belligerent relation, would be attended with no valuable practical results, from the constitutional necessity of a trial within the rebellious districts, where the peers of the delinquent will be none other than the partners of his guilt.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest an amendment by adding the words "court-martial or" before the words "military commission."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I accept the amendment. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, if the resolution is not laid on the table, and the previous question is not seconded, will it be in order to move to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It would unless some one rises to debate it, in which case it would go over.

Mr. CONKLING. Does it not refer to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to.

The previous question was then seconded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will waive my motion on the adoption of the resolution, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TOBACCO IN THE LEAF.

Mr. MYERS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the internal revenue law as to leave the tax on tobacco in the leaf.

DUTY ON COFFEE, SUGAR, ETC.

Mr. STROUSE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the duty or tariff on coffee, sugar, tea, pepper, salt, and other necessities of life.

TEST OATH.

Mr. STEVENS offered the following preamble and resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas, certain high officials have communicated the fact that they have appointed to office, and allowed to act officially, several rebels who did not and could not take the test oath as required by law; Therefore, Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any legislative measures are necessary to enforce obedience to the law by all men, without regard to rank or color.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble and resolution were agreed to.

STARVATION OF PRISONERS.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution offered by Mr. WILLIAMS was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' PAY.

Mr. WELKER submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment to privates and officers of the Union Army during the late rebellion of their monthly pay from the date of their discharge until notice was given them of such discharge or acceptance of resignation, and until relieved from duty, and report by bill or otherwise.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. SPALDING submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing to be compiled and published in a single volume, if practicable, with a suitable index, all laws now in force regulating the postal service of the United States, and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the internal revenue laws by the reduction of the tax upon common cigars and manufactured common tobacco.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. GRIDER submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the United States Government grants the power peaceably, or if necessary by arms, "to enforce the laws, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion;" but the General Government cannot by any action whatever destroy itself nor the State governments; nor can the State governments destroy either, or legally disturb the harmony of the whole. All the grants and powers under the Constitution are conservative, none destructive; wherefore all the States have been and are always in the Union.

Resolved, That when the United States Government suppressed the insurrection it only vindicated its constitutional power and preëxisting rights, and no more; and the rights and powers of the Federal and State Governments are all remitted back and assume the same condition and relations sustained before the insurrection, and (except so far as altered or amended) remain unimpaired and in full force and virtue.

Resolved, That the law of Congress apportioning Representatives to the several States (including the insurrectionary States) under the census of 1860 is constitutional and valid, and that members of Congress from all the States, regularly elected under said law, are entitled forthwith to their seats upon taking the oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That as a generous kindness and cordial forgiveness consistent with right, now peace exists, are the highest attributes of our nature, and as we must have "one Government, one Constitution, and one people," the glory, protection, and safety of all—cherishing these feelings, we say it is untimely, unjust, and impolitic to insist upon amendments to the Constitution to operate upon all until all are represented in the House and Senate.

Resolved, That it is illogical and unconstitutional to hold that States are in the Union to vote for constitutional amendments and yet not entitled to representation in Congress.

Resolved, That to tax any State by Congress and refuse to the people representation is contrary to the first principles of the American Government, and is inconsistent with the constitutional and equal rights of all the people.

Mr. STEVENS. Is it in order to debate those resolutions?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The resolutions are referred, under the resolution of the House, to the joint committee on reconstruction.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SMITH submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, if in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, any correspondence or other information in possession of the Government in regard to a demonstration made by both branches of the Congress of the United States of Colombia in honor of President Juarez, of the republic of Mexico, for his perseverance in defending the independence and liberty of his country, and any other similar demonstrations from any other countries.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. McKEE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas certain judges of the State courts of the State of Kentucky have set aside the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," and have refused to parties the benefit and protection which this act was intended to give them, and further, the Legislature of said State having recently passed a law making it unlawful for the judicial officers of said Commonwealth to carry out certain provisions of said act: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into and report at the earliest day practicable what additional legislation is necessary to carry into effect the provisions of said act, if in their opinion a remedy can be applied by legislation, and to report to this House by bill or otherwise.

PRESENTS TO OFFICE-HOLDERS.

Mr. NIBLACK submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the conduct of his Excellency, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, in declining to accept a carriage and horses tendered to him since his accession to office by some of his friends in New York, was, under the circumstances which surrounded him, eminently prudent, commendable, and patriotic, affording, as it did, a valuable example to others similarly situated, and meets the unqualified approbation of this House.

Be it further resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the practice, now so common, of persons holding official positions under the Government accepting presents of value from their subordinates in office, more or less dependent upon them for appointment, promotion, or other official favors, is demoralizing in its tendencies, destructive of public confidence, and ought to be prohibited.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to lay those resolutions on the table.

Mr. KASSON. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] not to press his resolutions to a vote now. It does not seem to those of us on this side who are equally interested with him in the establishment of correct principles to be worthy the special action of the House in that manner.

Mr. NIBLACK. As small as the matter may seem to be, I think it a matter of some importance, and I must call the previous question on it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is that these resolutions denominate the President of the United States "his Excellency." There is no such officer known to the Constitution of the United States; it is anti-democratic; a title not known or recognized. Our Chief Magistrate is designated "the President of the United States."

Mr. NIBLACK. I confess that is a matter with which I am not so au fait, perhaps, as the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I am in the habit of using plain language, and try to express the idea I intend to convey. That is the way I try to get at what I mean.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this is a new point of order. His recollection is that in the debates of early Congresses many of the members called him "his Excellency, the President."

Mr. SCHENCK. There is no such officer known under the Constitution as "his Excellency, the President;" and I am astonished that, even with all their lately conceived admiration of the present Chief Magistrate, it should come from the Democratic side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman is correct. But in the First Congress, after debate in both branches on the appropriate title, it was dropped without being settled; but the first Speaker sent a message to the Senate in which he styled him "the President;" and that is doubtless the proper official title.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. NIBLACK called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 126, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, James M. Ashley, Bottwell, Cook, Beckley, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Hooper, Kelso, Loan, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, Plants, Price, Sloan, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Barker, Baldwin, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Bundy, Jamain, Bidwell, Clark, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Dawson, Defrees, Deming, Conkling, Cullom, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James B. Hubbell, Hulburd, James H. Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Ladin, Marshall, Marvin, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spaulding, Stevens, Stillwell, Strouse, Tabor, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—126.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Bergen, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Culver, Darling, Davis, Delano, Dumont, Garfield, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Johnson, Jones, Le Blond, Longyear, Marston, McCullough, McRuer, Moulton, Patterson, Pomeroy, Raymond, Rousseau, Schenck, Starr, Trowbridge, and Wright—37.

So the resolutions were not laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions go over until Monday next, the morning hour having expired pending the call of the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to give notice that when these resolutions again come up for action, I will move the following amendment in addition:

And that it is to be regretted that members of this Congress cannot, many of them, take like approbation to themselves for patriotically and nobly refusing to accept free passes tendered them by various street railways and other railroad companies.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. STEVENS. I am instructed by the joint committee on reconstruction, which is authorized to report at any time, to report a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time. It is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —. Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I will say one word on this subject. I will not make a speech, because every member here has, I suppose, for the last six weeks had this question under consideration.

There are twenty-two States whose Legislatures are now in session, some of which will adjourn within two or three weeks. It is very desirable, if this amendment is to be adopted, that it should go forth to be acted upon by the Legislatures now in session. It proposes to change the present basis of representation to a representation upon all persons, with the proviso that wherever any State excludes a particular class of persons from the elective franchise, that State to that extent shall not be entitled to be represented in Congress. It does not deny to the States the right to regulate the elective franchise as they please; but it does say to a State, "If you exclude from the right of suffrage Frenchmen, Irishmen, or any particular class of people, none of that class of persons shall be counted in fixing your representation in this House. You may allow them to vote or not, as you please; but if you do allow them to vote, they will be counted and represented here; while if you do not allow them to vote, no one shall be authorized to represent them here; they shall be excluded from the basis of representation."

As I said before, I shall not make a speech upon what every man understands, what is contained in a nutshell, unless some gentleman on the other side of the House desires to discuss this question.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to ask the gentleman for what purpose he proposes to this side of the House a discussion. Is it for the purpose of opening discussion now, or for the purpose of having some future day fixed for the discussion of the subject?

Mr. STEVENS. I intend, if the House is ready, to have this joint resolution passed before the sun goes down.

Several MEMBERS. We are ready.

Mr. STEVENS. But I will say frankly to the gentleman that a gentleman on that side of the House, a member of the committee on reconstruction, asked me not to deprive him of the opportunity of saying a word upon the amendment, which he did not approve in committee; and I thought it might be a matter of courtesy to say to him, "You shall have that opportunity." Then I intended that, if there should be any member on this side of the House, some member of the committee perhaps, desirous to reply to the gentleman, it should be done; and then I proposed to submit to the House whether it was not ready to pass this amendment to-day.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say a word or two which will lead me to the question that I desire to ask. Here the whole policy of our Government is proposed to be changed in the twinkling of an eye—

Mr. STEVENS. I do not yield to my colleague to discuss this question at present.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Well, then, I ask my colleague to allow that this proposed amendment to the Constitution may be laid upon the table and be printed, so that we may have proper opportunity to understand its full scope. I know the scope of it, so far as Pennsylvania is concerned. I know that it will reduce her representation on this floor, and as a Pennsylvanian, I am against it or any similar proposition. But I do not know how it will affect other States; and therefore I ask my distinguished colleague to allow this proposition to be at least printed, so that we may fully and clearly understand its bearings before voting upon it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. STEVENS. I will do so.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this same subject, having been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, has been considered by that committee, who had determined to report, for the action of the House, a proposition which, if I correctly caught the language of this proposed amendment as read, is substantially identical with it. I merely state this to show that the Committee on the Judiciary, after careful consideration, have reached the same conclusion on this subject as the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. GRIDER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman wish to discuss the question?

Mr. GRIDER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow a proposition to be made. He is the only gentleman occupying the floor who can make a motion in regard to this measure which I desire, and that is that the bill shall be ordered to be printed, and the question postponed to some day this week, as early as you please. so that when we are called on to vote we may do so after argument on the important issue presented. We want the bill printed, and we want an opportunity to debate these questions; and it remains with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, occupying the attitude he does, whether he shall force it upon us without debate, and without the measure being printed.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to say a word.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. STEVENS. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, who is a member of the committee.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I present the minority report on this matter by the consent of the whole committee.

Mr. STEVENS. After my colleague on the committee has discussed this question as much as he desires, if we can have the previous question called, I am willing that the bill shall be postponed until to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROGERS. I am ready to say what I have to say now, if the House is ready.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from New Jersey to proceed.

Mr. CHANLER. Before my friend from New Jersey proceeds, I want that this matter may be put right upon the record.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to suspend for a moment and allow me to make a suggestion to fix a day certain, to-morrow or some other day, to which this matter shall be postponed.

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANLER. I object unless the gentleman yield unconditionally, because it carries with it a previous personal arrangement made by one gentleman on this side with the leader of the House on the other side.

Mr. ROGERS. I have made no such arrangement.

Mr. CHANLER. I want that statement made, so that we may understand on this side of the House how far members in opposition to this movement are committed by any arrangement on the part of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot take up the time of the gentleman from New Jersey without his consent.

Mr. ROGERS. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I am as much in favor as he can be of having this matter fully discussed.

Mr. CHANLER. I take that for granted.

Mr. ROGERS. As I was on the committee and submitted the report from the minority, I desire to state to the House the reasons why I oppose this amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CHANLER. As I understand, the gentleman from New Jersey is allowed to take the floor on an arrangement with the chairman of the reconstruction committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from New Jersey has yielded to me and not to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not yield to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects to the gentleman from New Jersey yielding unless he yields unconditionally.

Mr. CHANLER. I make the point of order that it is not in order for the gentleman from Ohio to make a point of order and then to make an explanation.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is what the gentleman is doing. [Laughter.] Therefore the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CHANLER. I know I am out of order, and the gentleman from Ohio is out of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman from New Jersey will yield the floor I will make a suggestion.

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House there ought to be, at some time and to some extent, opportunity afforded to consider any amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in every word and phrase, so that we may understand how it will affect that important instrument. In this important amendment the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa] says that, as he can catch the words of the amendment, it is about the same as one that committee was about to propose. We ought not to pass upon a bill of which we can only catch the words, especially an amendment of that sacred instrument, the Constitution of the United States.

I say that something equivalent to this ought to pass—I shall give it my entire hearty concurrence—but at the same time I hope to see it made the special order for to-morrow if you please, and from day to day until disposed of, having it in the mean time printed, that we may observe carefully and weigh understandingly the import and meaning of every word of the resolution.

Now, sir, I have offered myself an amendment to the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and this proposes a modification which will probably accomplish the same object which I intended, freed from certain objections arising out of inequality of numbers of the male adults in the several States. I am inclined to think, without having had an opportunity of looking particularly into this amendment, that I shall agree to it as a modification and accept it cheerfully in lieu of that which I myself proposed. But I would at least desire to have an opportunity of looking into it, in order to see whether I can so accept or accede to it.

I therefore suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that he do not call the previous question to-day, but reserve the right to call it, and that he fix some hour to-morrow at which this shall be made the special order, having it in the mean time printed, and making it the special order from day to day until disposed of; either calling the previous question after there has been some debate, or permit the debate to run on until it is itself exhausted. I think it will probably be found necessary to call the previous question after some debate on the subject when both sides have been heard. I, for one, have no objection to that; but give us some time to look into it, if it be only half a day.

Mr. STEVENS. My purpose, after the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] and some members on our side have delivered their views upon the joint resolution, was to postpone its further consideration till to-morrow and have it printed. Then I design to fix some time to-morrow when I shall move the previous question. That was my intention; and unless the House should think unfavorably of it I shall follow that course. So, then, after the gentleman from New Jersey and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] shall have spoken, I intend to move to postpone its further consideration till to-morrow, and have it printed. Then I mean to say that I shall not consent to a general running debate, as it will be a sure way to defeat it by amendments.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order, that the chairman of the committee has no right to exclude a member of the minority of the committee from producing and debating a minority report on the floor of this House; in other words, that a member of the committee has a right to debate the question under the rule.

The SPEAKER. A member of the committee is on the floor now proposing to debate it. The Chair recognized him, without knowing of any arrangement in the committee, under the usage of the House, which is, that members of the committee shall have preference in speaking.

Mr. CHANLER. The Chair will excuse me for reiterating the fact that the chairman of the committee asserted that such an arrangement was made, and I yielded under that arrangement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] is recognized, and not the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.]

Mr. SLOAN. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to yield for the purpose of having an amendment that I offer read.

Mr. ROGERS. I yield for the purpose of having it read, but not for debate.

The SPEAKER. It will be read for information.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment of Mr. SLOAN, as follows:

That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XIII.

SEC. 1. Representatives in Congress shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective number of qualified electors. The actual enumeration shall be made in the year 1870, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as Congress shall by law direct.

SEC. 2. Direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to the appraised value of taxable property therein respectively. The rule of apportionment of taxation shall be uniform.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] yield a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. I will.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I understand perfectly well the power of the chairman of the committee who reported this amendment, and how he derives that power. It is simply through the will of the majority of this House, and to that majority I have a word to say. We desire that we shall have time to look into this subject, and I ask of the gentleman who introduced this joint resolution that he will consent that the consideration of the subject shall be postponed until Thursday next, then to be made the special order from day to day until disposed of. In the mean time it will be printed. This is precipitate action that is proposed. I call it precipitate, for until I heard the resolution read I knew nothing of it; nor do I think many members of the House knew of it. The country is totally unaware of the proposition. I hope, therefore, that the chairman of the committee will assent to a postponement, so that we may have at least an opportunity of seeing what it is and considering it.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to yield to me for a moment to allow me to make a personal explanation as to my absence from the House on Thursday last when the final vote was taken on the passage of the District of Columbia suffrage bill.

Mr. ROGERS. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. In the report of the proceedings of the House in the Baltimore Sun the following note appears appended to the report:

"NOTE.—Owing to the great confusion on the floor of the House last evening, Mr. JOHN L. THOMAS, of Maryland, was understood to have voted against the negro suffrage bill; although he voted on the previous question he did not vote on the bill, being absent from the Hall when the vote was taken."

That statement, without any further allusion to it on my part, subjects me to misconstruction, and intimates that I shirked a responsibility which I am always ready and willing to meet.

I will state that in the afternoon of that day I was in the receipt of two communications which made it absolutely necessary for me to leave the city in the Annapolis train, which left at thirty-five minutes after four, to attend to business of my constituents on matters equally important to them as the suffrage bill.

Anxious to vote on the several propositions, I came to the House on the afternoon of that day and voted to lay the bill upon the table, which I considered a test question. I voted also against the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] for qualified suffrage, and then I turned my head to the clock and found that it wanted only ten minutes of the starting time of the Annapolis train, and I left.

I desire to say that when I left this Hall, it was with no intention of evading the issue of that bill; because I had placed myself upon the record, as I thought, fairly and squarely against negro suffrage, either qualified or universal, and I desire now to ask the consent of the House to allow me, under these circumstances, to record my vote against the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, under the rule of the House, unanimous consent cannot be given. The rule adopted by the last Congress requires a member who records his vote to be in his seat during the roll-call, and if he is not in during the roll-call, the Chair cannot entertain a proposition to ask unanimous consent for him to vote.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. I will state, then, that if I had been present when the vote was taken, I should have voted against the passage of the bill.

Mr. WHALEY. I hope the House will indulge me while I state that had I been present when the bill was passed extending suffrage in the District of Columbia I should certainly have voted against it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to obtain some information in regard to that rule relating to voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer any question the gentleman may put.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If I understand aright two thirds of the House can suspend the rules, and if two thirds of the House can consent to a man's voting, cannot the whole House do it?

The SPEAKER. It cannot, because the rule is laid down in specific terms. The gentleman from Illinois has been a member of the House for many years, and he knows that the rules can only be suspended on Mondays after the morning hour, and when no other business is pending before the House. A joint resolution is now pending on which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] is entitled to the floor. If the House should pass from its consideration before the adjournment, then a motion to suspend the rules for this or any other purpose would be in order. It would not be in order except in that contingency.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, in order that I may be placed right with regard to the position which I took in the committee upon this question, I state to the House that there was no agreement upon my part, either express or implied, that this debate should be confined to any particular number of persons on either side, and I am here upon the Democratic theory that a question of this importance ought not to be passed upon by this House without allowing all persons upon both sides full opportunity for debate.

Sir, this is a question different from those which have usually been brought to the attention of the people of this country. It is the first time since the formation of the Government of the United States that any proposition of this kind or of a similar character has ever been offered to the House of Representatives or to the people of the United States for their ratification. It is a proposition to change the organic law of the land with regard to one of the fundamental principles which was laid down by our fathers at the formation of the Constitution as an axiom of civil and political liberty, that taxation and representation should always go together. If gentlemen will examine this proposed amendment of the Constitution they will see that it is in violation of that great doctrine which was proclaimed by the fathers of the Republic when they enunciated the Declaration of Independence, and protested against the tyranny and despotism of England, because she attempted to tax the people of the colonies without allowing them representation in the councils of the kingdom. The amendment now under consideration proposes the very same identical thing that the Parliament of England proposed when it attempted to inflict upon the American colonies taxation without allowing the people of the colonies to have representatives in the Parliament of England to represent them upon the question whether they should be taxed by the mother country or not.

When the Constitution of the United States was made, our fathers, in pursuance of the object of the Revolution, and in the exercise of their wisdom, embodied in it the doctrine that representation should not be based upon the voting population of the country, but that it should be solely and wholly based upon the numbers of the people, without regard to sex or color, adding to those who were persons and citizens within the meaning of the organic law a representation for three fifths of the slave population of this country.

This joint resolution now under consideration contains a proviso which saps the very foundation and principles upon which the genius and institutions of this country have rested from the commencement of its political existence. The proviso reads:

Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

In other words, it inflicts upon the States a penalty for refusing to the colored population an unqualified right of suffrage which it does not inflict upon them for refusing the same thing to the white population. While it denies representation to the States for their negroes, it inflicts upon them taxation without representation, and in that indirect way compels the States to adopt unqualified negro suffrage in order to allow them their rights under the present organic law.

The first objection I have to the passage of this joint resolution is that it is violative of the main principle upon which the revolutionary war was conducted, and which induced our fathers to enter the harbors of Boston and New York and throw the tea into the water. Because the British people attempted to inflict taxation upon them with regard to that tea, and refused to allow them representation in the Parliament of England, our fathers rebelled against their mother country. The present organic law has existed for more than seventy-five years, until it brought the people of this country to a state of prosperity at home and consideration abroad never exceeded and scarcely paralleled in the history of the world. Under it liberty was secured; private rights undisturbed; every man's house was his castle, and the principles of liberty were handed down to the descendants of the Revolution upon the basis that governed their action; and until the war power, imbedded in usurpation, trampled it under foot, it was a safe and sure bulwark of liberty and barrier against despotism and tyranny.

"Woodman, spare that tree,
Touch not a single bough,
In youth it sheltered me,
And I'll protect it now."

The present organic law provides that—

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

Now, I ask this House what has happened since the adoption of it by the different States who were then within the Union that now calls for the adoption of a principle which nowhere in the lines, spirit, words, or letter of it, has any standing or countenance. What has come over the fortunes and happiness of the people of this country that the great principle of the Constitution should now be violated, that principle for which our fathers spilt their blood to sustain the great axiom of American liberty, that taxation never should be imposed upon a people unless that people have a corresponding representation? If this amendment to the Constitution should be carried into effect, it will prevent any State, North or South, from allowing qualified suffrage to its colored population except upon forfeiture of representation: and if qualified suffrage should be allowed to the colored population of any State in this Union on account of race or color, and but one single negro should be deprived of his vote by failure to meet the requirements of the qualification imposed, that State would be denied representation for the whole of that colored population, men, women, and children. This proviso says:

That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

What does the word "abridge" mean? It means that if the State of Kentucky, South Carolina, or New Jersey should see fit to allow to its colored population the right of suffrage upon a qualification based upon property, or intelligence, or any other qualification which they did not impose upon the white people, each one of those States would be deprived of representation for every colored man, woman, and child in that State. Take the State of Massachusetts for example; in that State every negro who comes within the qualifications prescribed for white persons is entitled to exercise the right of suffrage. In New York the negro cannot exercise the right of suffrage unless he owns $250 worth of property. So that Massachusetts would have representation for every man, woman, and child of her colored population; while the great Empire State of New York, who in her wisdom has seen fit to forbid voting to negroes except they possess a certain amount of property, would not be allowed any representation for any one of her colored population, because within the meaning of this amendment it would be an abridgment of the elective franchise to negroes, on account of race or color, to place any qualifications upon them to entitle them to vote not imposed upon the white people.

Why, sir, this will drive—and this is the only object of the proposition—every State in this Union, except where the negroes are in the majority, to allow to the negroes within the States unqualified suffrage to save them from the penalty annexed to their refusal to concur in this dogma of the party in power, unqualified negro suffrage. The only object and the only effect of the bill are to induce the States, in order to secure their rightful representation on this floor, to allow to the negro unqualified suffrage, without any condition or qualification, without regard to the degree of intelligence or education which he may possess. The State that attempts to require any qualification of one single negro to vote will, under this amendment, be deprived of representation for every man, woman, and child of the color or race of the person who may have qualified suffrage unless the same conditions are imposed upon white people.

More than that: this bill attempts, in an indirect manner, to have passed upon by the Legislatures of the different States a question which the party in power dare not boldly and openly meet before the people of this country, because there can be but one object lying at the foundation of this bill—an object which has been explained and expatiated upon in this House—and that object, as I have said, is, through the Federal power, to force the States to adopt unqualified negro suffrage, by holding over them the penalty of being deprived of representation according to population.

What is there more democratic and republican in the institutions of this country than that the people of all classes, without regard to whether they are voters or not, white or black, who make up the intelligence, wealth, and patriotism of the country, shall be represented in the councils of the nation? Every man in this House knows perfectly well in the several States a person under the age of twenty-one years cannot vote; unsaturated citizens cannot vote, and the whole class of females, constituting nearly one half of the population of this country, cannot vote; yet for these persons the States are entitled to representation. Yet, because there are in certain States negroes, men of an inferior race, men who by the laws of God are stamped with an inferiority so indelible that nothing can wipe it out, it is proposed that such States shall only enjoy their full right to representation here on the condition that they will allow to these negroes the unqualified right of suffrage on a perfect equality with the white citizen.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me one moment for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether it is not possible that the male minor may come to an age that will secure him the right to vote; and whether it is not possible for the unnaturalized foreigner also to acquire that right; and whether, inasmuch as both may acquire it in the current decade, they should not be included in the basis of representation; and whether the mere efflux of time or force of will will change the complexion of an intelligent quadroon, so that he may vote. The freeman who can never vote should not be counted among voters and possible voters in fixing the basis of suffrage.

Mr. ROGERS. I can answer that question by stating to the gentleman that it is not improbable that, even without any constitutional legislation, the States (as many of them have already done in a qualified form, and some upon an unqualified basis) may yet allow to the negroes the same political status that the gentleman says may be allowed to the man under twenty-one and the unnaturalized foreigner. The gentleman's suggestion, therefore, does not affect the force of the argument which I am endeavoring to present.

Why, sir, I undertake to say, and I defy contradiction, that this proposed amendment will give to negroes rights that it will not allow to white men. It will allow a State to retain its full quota of representation, though it should disfranchise all its white citizens, not on account of race or color, provided it will enfranchise the negroes. White men may be disfranchised to an unlimited extent by the States and the States still be allowed representation for that whole race; yet if they do the same thing to negroes that whole race is excluded from the basis of representation.

It appears to have in its body, in its soul, and in its life only one great object and aim, that is, to debase and degrade the white race, and to place upon a higher footing than the white men are placed, under the Constitution, this African race.

Now, sir, at the formation of the Constitution of the United States there was not a single State of the whole thirteen which adopted that instrument that did not impose conditions upon the right of suffrage to the white men. Every State constitution which existed at the time the States entered into the Union, and for a long time afterward, imposed qualifications as conditions precedent to the exercise of the right of suffrage on the part of the white men. No man will deny that on this or on the other side of the House. The organic law of the land, if amended as proposed, will give Congress the sovereign power and right to control the States through its power of refusing representation unless the States acquiesce in the contemptible doctrine of negro suffrage.

This amendment allows the States in their sovereign capacity to exclude white men from the polls on the ground of property or any other reason, except race or color, while it deprives the States of representation for doing the same thing to the colored people, as the intent of the States would be construed to be their act, exercised by them, upon the negroes, on account of race or color.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the gentleman be kind enough to inform the House why he says that such a distinction between races could occur under this amendment? Is it not true of one race as much as another that any qualification or requirement could be imposed? If inflicted upon either race or the members of either race, "on account of race or color merely," then only exclusion from the basis of representation would be worked, but no more in favor of one race, or against one race or color more than another.

Mr. ROGERS. That does not meet the argument that I am making. If they are disfranchised on account of race or color—and that is the only conceivable reason for which they would be construed to be disfranchised—then the whole race would be unrepresented; whereas no disfranchisement of white people would be construed to be done on account of race and color, as it cannot be expected that white people would disfranchise their own people because they were white. The States, in the exercise of sovereign power, can impose such qualifications upon the exercise of the right of suffrage as they please. That right they reserved, and there I want to leave it, free from any penalty.

Mr. CONKLING. In answer to the gentleman's question, I do undertake to say if any State should impose qualifications alike upon white and black, and those qualifications thus impartially imposed should happen to include negroes, because they could not come up to them, notwithstanding that the State would be entitled to its entire negro population for the purpose of representation. I do say that would be the law.

Mr. ROGERS. I do say that no such construction as that can be given the law, because it is a well-settled principle of construction that you must look at the intent and object of the Legislature which passed the law. In the construction of a law you must ascertain what was the mischief the Legislature intended to remedy. That is the way to construe a law. It is a settled maxim of construction that the object and intent of the Legislature are to be ascertained by finding out the mischief it intended to remedy. What is the object of this amendment? What is the injury it is intended to prevent? The injury is that negroes are not allowed to vote on account of their race. The object, then, is to prevent that injury by annexing such a penalty to the continuance of the mischief as will eventually compel the States to grant to the negroes unqualified suffrage. Now, sir, if the States abridge the right of suffrage to the negroes, would not a true construction of this amendment make such action of the States a violation of the organic law, in this, that such action would prevent the aim and object of the law, and for that reason the States would lose their representation for such race? By refusing the States untrammelled sovereignty over the elective franchise you violate the great principle of democracy, that all the population in a country ought to be represented, although not allowed to exercise the elective franchise. The withdrawal of that right ought not to deprive them of representation.

The object of this amendment is to remedy this supposed evil which the members of the Republican party suppose exists in the Constitution in allowing to the States in their sovereign capacity the right to control the elective franchise—either to disallow it entirely, or to put such restriction on it as the States in their sovereign power may dictate. Therefore they claim that the Federal Government ought to take under its wings and under its control this sovereign power of a State by saying to it, "If you refuse to allow a certain portion of your population to vote, or impose conditions upon their voting, on account of race or color, you shall have no representation in the councils of this country for any of the people of that race or color." Why, sir, was there ever anything so unjust in the annals of the history of legislation in this country? Was there ever anything proposed that strikes at the foundation of liberty like this; that pours out the vials of despotism upon the heads of the people of the southern States—States which now, in my judgment, constitute gallant stars in the galaxy of the glorious old Union of the United States as it existed before the commencement of civil hostilities in this land?

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ROGERS. I will.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether that provision of the Constitution which confines the basis of representation to three fifths of this class of people has not been abrogated by war, or rather by the results of the war, in freeing that class of people; whether, therefore, now, the South, notwithstanding this provision in the Constitution, would not be entitled to count the whole black population as five fifths instead of three fifths in computing the number of Representatives to which they are entitled; and whether the result of that computation would not be to add to the representation of the States lately in rebellion on this floor twelve or thirteen members in addition to the number which they had before the war. I desire to ask the gentlemen whether he is in favor of that result.

Mr. ROGERS. I am in favor of that result; and I was just going to show the reason and justice of it. Why, I ask the gentleman, should not the southern States, the colored population of which have been freed by the results of the war, have a representation based upon that population, the same as they were entitled to under the old Constitution in regard to freemen? Did not all the States which freed the slaves afterward have representation for five fifths of them?

Under the Constitution as it now is, representation in all the States is based upon their free male and female persons, without regard to their being of African, Asiatic, or European origin. The Constitution spreads its wings over the whole population; and because slaves in the South were not regarded as a proper basis of full representation—it being decided in the celebrated Dred Scott case that they were not considered as people or citizens within the meaning of the organic law—they had the representation for those slaves cut down to three fifths, on the ground that they ought to have some representation; and as they were mere chattels in the eyes of the law, the States in which that chattel property existed were not entitled to the whole representation that they would or ought to have had, under the organic law with regard to people of that race or color or status.

Now, the result of the war has been to change the status of that whole population from slaves into freemen. It is a cogent and most forcible argument in favor of the wisdom, genius, and patriotism of those who adopted the old Constitution of the United States, that every free man in a State, of whatever color, was entitled to representation. And that is one of the safeguards of the rights of the State. It was thrown around the States in order that they should have sovereign power to control the right of suffrage to all persons.

The proposed amendment to the Constitution undertakes to consolidate the power in the Federal Government. It throws out a menace to the States, and the inevitable result of the passage would be to induce every State in the Union to adopt unqualified negro suffrage so as not to deprive them of the great and inestimable right of representation for that class of population in the Halls of the legislation of the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. Before asking the question I desire to say that I am irrevocably opposed to the passage of the amendment to the Constitution now before the House. I ask the question simply to elucidate the argument. I want the gentleman to tell me, if he can, whether there is any reason that when our Government shall be reconstructed, one pardoned rebel of South Carolina who may not be able to read and write, and who may have fought for four years against the Government, shall, in political power, alike on the floor of Congress and in electing a President, outweigh three or five intelligent returned soldiers of New Jersey, who throughout the same four years fought for the Union; and whether, if the colored people of South Carolina be represented on this floor, and yet be denied a vote, the gentleman who will succeed the late Preston S. Brooks will not be elected by a vote so small that it will take at least five Jersey soldiers to counterbalance the vote of each South Carolina voter in that district? The votes in the gentleman's district will number more than five to one in that district. If there must be inequality, the patriot soldier should, in my judgment, outweigh the pardoned but bloody handed traitor in the councils of the nation.

Mr. ROGERS. The argument which I was making was tending to answer the very objection which the gentleman makes.

Now, sir, I hold to the doctrine of the Constitution as it is, allowing the States to exercise sovereign control and power over the qualifications and rights of the whole voting population. I say that if the State of South Carolina, or the State of Louisiana, in the exercise of its sovereign and delegated powers, sees fit to enfranchise those who have taken up arms against the flag of their country, it is within their discretion and under their control, and under the Constitution of the United States and the organic law of their own States they may exercise that right. And let me say to gentlemen that when the State of Missouri struck at the foundation of political rights and political society and disfranchised one half or two thirds of the population of the State because they took up arms against the country, it degraded the memory of Washington and his compeers who declared by revolution and appeal to God that they would be free from Great Britain because she attempted to exercise the powers of despotism and tyranny over them, and the action of that State is a burning disgrace upon the proud record of civil, political, and religious liberty in this country.

Ah! sir, it will yet have to be admitted—that has been admitted by all men—that the right of revolution is an inherent power which God Almighty has implanted in the human breast. Whenever a people believe they are oppressed by despotism and tyranny, and have sufficient power to throw them off, they have the right to resort to revolution.

Without saying anything in disparagement of the sages and heroes of the Revolution, do not let us forget that had it not been for revolution the first flag of liberty would never have been planted on this continent; and that by the blood of the sires of the Revolution are we to-day enjoying, because of their revolution against England, the proud heritage of civil liberty, which I want to hand down to the people of this country and their children and children's children unimpaired for ever and ever.

Now, sir, do not let me be reported as favoring secession. I am here to stand by the doctrines of Andrew Johnson. I am here to reconstruct these States at once. I would go further. I would open the halls of legislation in this country to our erring brethren, and in a Christian spirit say to them, "Come here through your Representatives into the Halls of Congress; let us bind ourselves together as a band of brothers, and march in joint phalanx to the halls of the Montezumas, and drive the imperial despot from his throne." [Applause in the galleries.]

Sir, it is because I love my country, because I love these States, because I love the grand foundations of liberty which were cemented by the blood of our fathers, that I invoke the Power above to so control and direct our hearts that every single one of the stars and stripes which now emblazon themselves upon that glorious flag shall wave in triumph from one end of this country to the other. It is because this joint resolution saps the foundation of the principles which induced our fathers to spill their blood upon the battle-fields of the Revolution that I, in my humble capacity as a Representative of one of the old thirteen States, and as a Representative of this whole Union, use my voice and my power in behalf of that great constitutional Government which gives us peace, liberty, happiness, and prosperity, and whose foundations were laid broad, strong, and deep in the beginning by George Washington and the other patriots and heroes of the Revolution.

Sir, why should South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Florida, and the other glorious States of this Union have such a law as this passed upon them, taking away representation from half their population, when tyranny and despotism are preventing their Representatives from entering the Halls of legislation of the country, and preventing them from joining the body of the vox populi and speaking out in opposition to the legislation proposed by the portion of the States now assembled in Congress?

Why, sir, take two or three States of the South; take South Carolina and the other three States whose negroes constitute a majority of the population. By the passage of this joint resolution you strip them of more than one half of the whole representation for which their fathers, side by side with the men of the North, shed their blood; that blood which now glows in the veins of us, their descendants. That representation they derived, based not upon the voting population, but upon the whole people who are free, without regard to their race or color. If this amendment shall pass, and New Jersey shall alter her organic law and strike from it the word "white," and give to her colored population a qualified suffrage, still she can have no representation for any of the race or color who have their franchise abridged by reason of that qualification. Would it not be better, be more consonant to reason and to common sense, would it not be doing according to the injunction of Holy Writ, "Do unto others as ye would have others do unto you," to submit this organic law to the people of the different States? This amendment provides that whenever any portion of the colored population shall have but qualified suffrage, on account of race or color, the whole of that population shall be excluded from the basis of representation. It goes so far that if New Jersey pass a law allowing such of her black population to vote as can read the Constitution of the United States, and although every negro in that State could take advantage of that qualification and could read the Constitution of the United States except one, then New Jersey would lose the advantage of representation for the whole of that population. Will honorable gentlemen stand here in the face of this country, and the intelligence and patriotism of the masses of the South, and say to them, now when reason ought to have resumed its sway and the roaring of cannon ceased, "we shall so far exercise our power in a tyrannical manner as to prohibit representation to a State for its colored population if a single man of that colored population is prohibited from voting by the operation of a qualification based upon property, intelligence, or anything else?"

But I object to this joint resolution upon another ground—upon the same ground that I objected to the passage of the negro suffrage bill for the District of Columbia—without consulting the people. It has been said in this country that all power emanates from the people. And I say that to submit this grave question to the consideration and decision of partisan Legislatures in the different States, Legislatures which were elected without any regard to this question, is violative of the great principles which lie at the foundations of the liberties of this country; that no organic law, affecting the whole people, should be passed before submitting it to the people for their ratification or rejection. Now this joint resolution proposes simply to submit this amendment for ratification to the Legislatures of the different States.

The Legislatures are not the States; the Legislatures are not the people in their sovereign capacity; Legislatures are not the source from which all power emanates. But the people, the sacred people, in the exercise of their sovereign power, either at the ballot-box or in conventions, are the only true and proper forum to which such grave and serious questions should be submitted. If the people of the United States want negro suffrage, unqualified and unabridged, to be adopted in the United States of America, I, as a Democrat, as a citizen believing in the power of the majority, will yield to their decision. But I want that decision rendered in the manner contemplated by the spirit of self-government and not by Representatives of the people who have not been elected with reference to the decision of this question. Let it be submitted to conventions of the people, the delegates to which can be instructed to vote for or against inflicting a penalty in this indirect manner upon States, if they do not choose to adopt the policy of unqualified negro suffrage.

Why, sir, as I stated in the argument I made against the adoption of the bill passed by this House to inflict the disgraceful policy of negro suffrage upon the unoffending, harmless, and unprotected people of this District, I am now here to remind gentlemen that the State of Kansas was refused admission into the Union because her constitution, framed by the convention at Leecompton, had not been submitted directly to the people for their ratification or rejection. And you may look through the history of the States, and you will find nowhere in modern times, within a period of forty years, a State that has adopted or changed its organic law without first submitting the proposition which its Legislature or convention has adopted to the people at the ballot-box, where they can decide directly whether they want it or not.

Now, gentlemen, I am ready to meet this negro question. I am ready to go before the people of this country upon this policy; and I say that if we submit this question to the sovereign people in the election of delegates, so that they may pass upon it directly, we shall then have at least an invitation on the part of three fourths of the States to the other States to adopt unqualified negro suffrage. But when this question is submitted to the Legislatures that were elected without any regard to the question embraced in this bill, controlled by party rules, and acting under the party whip, they will be compelled to adopt it as a party measure, whether they approve it or not, as many members in this House voted the other day upon the question of negro suffrage in the District of Columbia.

Now, sir, when the Constitution was adopted every State that then constituted the Union had a negro population, quite a large population, too; and every State except the State of Massachusetts had a slave race. Now, sir, with a few exceptions, the negroes were not permitted to vote. By the Constitution of the United States none of them could exercise the right of voting; it was only under the organic laws of the States, adopted in the exercise of their sovereign power, that the negroes had the right to vote in any State. Yet neither the framers of the Constitution nor anybody else at that day claimed that it would not be right to allow representation for the colored population, whether that population was entitled to vote or not. Now, sir, I maintain that the Constitution of the United States, as it now exists, is not as liberal toward the southern States, now that slavery has been abolished, as it was before the abolition of slavery. Why, sir, in the days of the past, under our Constitution, the southern States have been allowed a representation for a population that was not classed as citizens or people; they were allowed a representation for people who had no political status in the State, persons who were not entitled even to exercise the right of coming into a court of civil justice as a plaintiff or defendant in the prosecution or defense of a suit.

Now, after the raging fires of war have swept from the domain of every State in the South the pernicious institution of slavery, after the result has been that every slave has received his freedom, after the slaves have gained more by the success of this war than any other class of people in the United States, white men, men who are the representatives of the white race, come here proposing to compel the States, on pain of being deprived of a portion of their representation, to allow all the negroes within their limits to vote, without regard to qualification or anything else, while under the same provision the State may, by its organic law, impose qualifications and conditions upon the exercise of the right of suffrage by the white population.

Why, sir, four million slaves have been set free; $3,000,000,000 have been expended in setting them free. In the northern States, for the purpose of carrying on the war, we have run up a county, township, and State indebtedness of $1,500,000,000 or $2,000,000,000 more. Five thousand million dollars have been expended; five hundred thousand brave white soldiers who left their families to go into the war; men without property; men whose hearts glowed with patriotism; have been sacrificed on the altar of negro philanthropy. Yet the ruling party is not content with robbing the South of millions of dollars invested in slaves and nearly ruining the country to free them, but they seek to inflict a disgrace upon the Anglo-Saxon race of the South by coercing them to bestow upon these slaves political rights after they have been taken away from their masters without compensation.

I think it time that we should begin to legislate for white people. What are the object and intent of this bill? Simply to force upon an unwilling population, in this indirect manner, negro suffrage, when the States of the gentlemen advocating this measure have not adopted negro suffrage. The gallant little State of Connecticut has repudiated negro suffrage by six or seven thousand majority. Why should you undertake, in this way, to force the doctrine of unqualified negro suffrage upon the southern States when your own States repudiated it? I have too much reverence for the fathers of our Government to give my approval to such a measure. I have not forgotten that our Government was established for the benefit of the white population of the country.

I have not forgotten it was white men who put down the tyranny of England and established the principles of liberty on this continent. I have not forgotten it was the white men of the northern States who went in thousands to the banks of the Mississippi to drive back the invaders from our soil. Yet when a soldier who fought for his country happened to be under twenty-one years of age, or unnaturalized, he was not permitted to vote, while the whole class of negroes must have that right until they adopt it and pass such laws as will give unqualified suffrage to the negro race.

It will not do to attempt to deny what is the object of this bill. This amendment is to constitute one of the barriers, to be devised by the committee of fifteen, to keep the South out of the Union. It is one of the points of that committee. Its object is to keep the States out. Let us extend to the southern people the hand of fellowship, and so let us act that they will regard the Constitution and the Union more sacredly than ever before. Let us look upon them as the father looked upon the prodigal son. Let us look over their violations of law, and take them again into full fellowship. In this way we will render the Union stronger than ever; and those southern States will then constitute, as they have done in the past, a bright galaxy upon the flag of our country.

The southern people are entitled, in my judgment, to representation without such qualifications as much as the northern men. When Andrew Johnson appointed southern men provisional governors of the southern States he did it in a spirit of Christianity and humanity. I beseech you not to pass legislation of this kind, because it will engender a spirit that will drive every sentiment of Union from the southern States. It will inflict an injury upon both the northern and southern States. It will diminish the representation of New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, because it will exclude from the basis of representation the negro population of those States.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."—Constitution, art. 1, sec. 2.

This is the provision by which apportionment and representation have till now been regulated in the United States. It is one of the compromises of the Constitution.

Strange as it may seem to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] it owes its existence to the same principle asserted in the pending amendment. What is that principle? That political representation does not belong to those who have no political existence.

The government of a free political society belongs to its members, and does not belong to others. If others are allowed to share in its control, they do so by express concession, not by right.

It was this principle which rendered necessary such a provision as I have read. It was this principle which brought that provision into our national charter.

The slaves of the South were not members of that political society which formed the Constitution of the United States. They were without personal liberty, and therein they were without a natural right, not a political right; but they were also without political rights, and therefore they were not members of the political community.

From this it followed that they were not to be represented as members.

From this it followed that political power was not to be apportioned by treating them as political persons.

Natural persons they were, producers they were, and the product of their labor was the proper subject of taxation.

But direct taxes and representation ought to be distributed uniformly among the members of a free Government. All alike should bear the burdens; all alike should share the benefits.

Here was a clear principle, palpably right and easy and certain in its application. It applied itself. It applied itself universally, and covered the whole case with only one exception.

I do not treat "Indians not taxed" as an exception, because uncivilized Indians in their tribal state were so far beyond the scope within which the Constitution was to act that they were named only to prevent possible mistake as to the meaning of language.

Neither was a fixed exception, or even an obstacle, found in the case of aliens or unaturalized foreigners.

The Constitution was to leave to the States and to give to the Congress power to clothe foreigners with full political rights as fast as they should be prepared to assume them. The only question remaining, therefore, as to them, was how they should be treated during the interval between their arrival and their naturalization, during their political nonage.

This question was disposed of in the liberal way in which the Government was conceived. The political disability of aliens was not for this purpose counted at all against them, because it was certain to be temporary, and they were admitted at once into the basis of apportionment.

The slave alone was the anomaly and the nondescript.

A man, and not a man. In flesh and blood, alive; politically, dead.

A native, an inhabitant, a producer, but without recognized political attribute or prerogative; the representative in the system of nothing but value.

What could be done with him? He was nowhere.

It could not be maintained by the slaveholding States that slaves were persons to be represented. It could not be maintained by the free States that slaves were persons to be taxed. For these purposes slaves were excluded altogether by the principle on which the Government was built. They were not embraced within it because they had no political standing in the States wherein they were held. Without some special provision, therefore, they would have been altogether ignored.

Taxes, however, were desirable on the one side and representation on the other, and for mere convenience a compromise was invented for the sake of both.

A purely arbitrary agreement was made and inserted in the Constitution, an agreement with nothing to support it but the consent of the parties, based upon the facts as they then stood. It was agreed in substance that the free people of all the States should be counted alike, and should all have their fair share of power as thus ascertained, and that then the free people of the slaveholding States should have as much power beside as would be measured by counting every slave as three fifths of a "person;" direct taxes to follow the same rule. The power thus agreed upon could not be exercised by the fractional persons themselves, but as somebody else owned them, it was so arranged that that same somebody else should own the political power also.

The covenant, whether wise or not, was operative as long as there was anything for it to operate upon.

That time is past. The provision has become impotent. The fall of slavery has superseded it. We have nothing now to rely upon in its place but the residue of the second section of the first article of the Constitution. That section, owing to the rupture of the technical tie of slavery, would, as it stands, work out results now which, when the Constitution was made, were condemned by the judgment of all.

"Free persons" was the term employed to describe all who had political rights and standing, because only slaves had neither.

But now a new anomaly exists. Four million people are suddenly among us not bound to any one, and yet not clothed with any political rights. They are not slaves, but they are not, in a political sense, "persons."

No figment of slavery remains with which to spell out a right in somebody else to wield for them a power which they may not wield themselves. This was one of the appurtenances of property in man, and has been extinguished by constitutional amendment, if it was not destroyed before.

This emancipated multitude has no political status.

Emancipation vitalizes only natural rights, not political rights.

Enfranchisement alone carries with it political rights, and these emancipated millions are no more enfranchised now than when they were slaves.

They never had political power. Their masters had a fraction of power as masters. But there are no masters now.

There are no slaves now. The whole relationship in which the power originated and existed is gone. Does this fraction of power still survive? If it does, what shall become of it? Where is it to go?

We are told the blacks are unfit to wield even a fraction of power, and must not have it. That answers the whole question. If the answer be true, it is the end of controversy. There is no place logically for this power to go save to the blacks; if they are unfit to have it, the power would not exist. It is a power astray, without a rightful owner. It should be resumed by the whole nation at once.

It should not exist; it does not exist. This fractional power is extinct.

A moral earthquake has turned fractions into units, and units into ciphers. If a black man counts at all now, he counts five fifths of a man, not three fifths. Revolutions have no such fractions in their arithmetic; war and humanity join hands to blot them out.

Four millions, therefore, and not three fifths of four millions, are to be reckoned in here now, and all these four millions are, and are to be, we are told, unfit for political existence.

Did the framers of the Constitution ever dream of this? Never, very clearly. Our fathers trusted to gradual and voluntary emancipation, which would go hand in hand with education and enfranchisement. They never peered into the bloody epoch when four million fetters would be at once melted off in the fires of war. They never saw such a vision as we see. Four millions, each a Caspar Hauser, long shut up in darkness, and suddenly led out into the full flash of noon, and each, we are told, too blind to walk, politically. No one foresaw such an event, and so no provision was made for it. The three-fifths rule gave the slaveholding States over and above all their just representation, eighteen Representatives beside, by the enumeration of 1860.

The new situation will enable those States when relationships are resumed, to claim twenty-eight Representatives beside their just proportion.

Twenty-eight votes to be cast here and in the Electoral College for those held not fit to sit as jurors, not fit to testify in court, not fit to be plaintiff in a suit, not fit to approach the ballot-box. Twenty-eight votes, to be more or less controlled by those who once betrayed the Government, and for those so destitute, we are assured, of intelligent instinct as not to be fit for free agency.

Shall all this be? Shall four million beings count four millions, in managing the affairs of the nation, who are pronounced by their fellow-beings unfit to participate in administering government in the States where they live, or in their counties, towns, or precincts; who are pronounced unworthy of the least and most paltry part in local political affairs?

Shall one hundred and twenty-seven thousand white people in New York cast but one vote in this House, and have but one voice here, while the same number of white people in Mississippi have three votes and three voices. Shall the death of slavery add two fifths to the entire power which slavery had when slavery was living? Shall one white man have as much share in the Government as three other white men merely because he lives where blacks outnumber whites two to one?

Shall this inequality exist, and exist only in favor of those who without cause drenched the land with blood and covered it with mourning? Shall such be the reward of those who did the foulest and guiltiest act which crimsones the annals of recorded time? No, sir; not if I can help it.

This privilege, class, aristocracy, in its most hateful form. It is not democracy or republicanism or free government at all. I take issue with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] at this point, as at many other points. I say it is monstrous and not fit to be. I deny that the law shall invest any man, though the blood of all the Howards were running in his veins, with one political right, with one home or fireside immunity, not given to the humblest and the poorest patriot I am permitted to represent.

To level this favoritism which has come out of the results of the war, three modes have been proposed, each of course by way of amendment to the Constitution.

First. To make the basis of representation in Congress and in the Electoral College consist of sufficiently qualified voters alone.

Second. To deprive the States of the power to disqualify or discriminate politically on account of race or color.

Third. To leave every State perfectly free to decide for itself, not only who shall vote, but who shall belong to its political community in any way, and thus to say who shall enter into its basis of representation and who shall be shut out. What the States decide for themselves in their own affairs they decide for themselves in their national affairs. If any State contains a class unfit or supposed to be unfit for political rights, unworthy to act politically in the States, this class shall not be put upon the nation as fit and worthy to be represented in the nation's councils.

The last proposition has met the approval of the committee, and the others have not. To the first proposition several objections have been urged, some of which will probably be found exaggerated, if not untenable, yet there are serious objections.

If voters alone should be made the foundation of representation, the actual ratio would vary infinitely among different States. One State might let women and minors vote. Another might—some of them do—give the ballot to those otherwise qualified who have been residents for only ten days. Another might extend suffrage to aliens. This would lead to a strife of unbridled suffrage.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman say that a State can allow aliens to vote for Federal officers?

Mr. CONKLING. As that question is not here, I have said nothing about it.

Mr. ROGERS. I understood the gentleman to say that a State might allow aliens to vote.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman will find it unnecessary to repeat his questions if he will but attend to what I say. I said that if an amendment to the Constitution basing representation upon "qualified voters" merely should be adopted, a State might enlarge its apportionment by allowing aliens to vote.

It may be answered that restrictions would prevent all this; and one of the propositions before the committee was to confine the basis to male voters twenty-one years of age and upward. This, it will be seen, still leaves open a door for growing inequalities. California may let her Chinese and half-breeds vote, Oregon her Indians, and any State its aliens. But even with uniform State legislation, such a plan would work in tendency, if not in results, some injustice toward the States in which women outnumber men, and especially toward those States from which young men most go out in quest of more buoyant activities and more boundless fields. It has been supposed that this injustice would be practically serious, and that the newest, the wildest, the least improved States, would be great gainers by it. It has been charged that New England would lose very largely should men be made the basis of representation in place, of including women and children. It has been said that the real objection to the male suffrage basis bill was the fear of taking away power from fanatical New England.

All this has no foundation. I speak from tables, carefully prepared, and showing results under all the plans proposed with almost absolute accuracy, and with the utmost necessary accuracy. Here they are. The first shows population classified; the second shows, with substantial accuracy, the results of different modes of apportioning Representatives:

NOTE.—In these several plans of apportionment the results are arrived at in the mode practiced under the present law, namely: the total representative population of all the States is first ascertained; this number is divided by 233, the number of Representatives provided by law at the time of the taking of the last census. This gives the requisite ratio to a member. The representative population of each State is then divided by the ratio, and the result, rejecting fractions, shows the number of Representatives to each State. The number unapportioned, in consequence of the fractions, is then added to the eight additional members provided by the law of 1862, and these are apportioned to the States having the largest fractions. The ratio under the present apportionment is 127,000. The ratio on the basis of population, including the negroes, is..... 133,700. The ratio on the basis of white suffrage is..... 29,300. The ratio on the basis of equal suffrage, white and black, is..... 33,500. The ratio on the basis of the proposed amendment is..... 114,800.

Entirely accurate data of the number of voters in the several States cannot be obtained from any recorded statistics. It is not shown by the presidential vote of 1860, for the reason that in some of the States where there was little real contest, the vote was far from full. The number of males above the age of twenty years, aliens included, as given by the census of 1860, is taken as the nearest approximate to the number of voters. The proportion of aliens will not hold alike in all the States, there being a larger ratio in the northern than in the southern section of the Union; but it is believed the results indicated in the table will be sufficiently accurate for present purposes.

From these tables it will be seen that no New England State would lose a single Representative either by making white men over twenty-one, or all men over twenty-one, the basis of apportionment. On the contrary, taking white men over twenty-one as the basis, Massachusetts would gain two, and Connecticut and Maine one each. New York would gain four. The losses would not be in the East. Upon a basis of male voters, black and white, Ohio and Illinois would lose one Representative each, and Pennsylvania two. California, almost alone of the States heretofore free, would gain. Her extraordinary abundance of male population would double her representation. It is now three; it would be six.

The argument based on differences between the old States and the new, in respect of age and sex, in population, is overcome by the fact that although these inequalities are large, the ratio of representation is larger; that is to say, that the whole number of Representatives being only two hundred and forty-one, it takes so many "persons" or "voters" to make up the required constituency for a single one, that the preponderance of men over women, except in California, is too small in any State seriously to affect the result.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. I hold in my hand a table which was prepared with very great care by my estimable friend on the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRILL,] in which upon a basis of white males above twenty-one years of age, upon a representation of two hundred and forty members, New York would have thirty-five and five tenths members, or on a close struggle for the fraction she would have thirty-six; Pennsylvania would have twenty-four and two tenths, and be confined to twenty-four members. To-day New York has thirty-one members and Pennsylvania twenty-four; giving New York now twenty-eight and a half per cent. more representation than Pennsylvania. But upon the basis upon which the table is calculated New York would be entitled to fifty per cent. more Representatives than Pennsylvania. I admit that Pennsylvania would not absolutely lose one of her Representatives, but relatively she would lose by the representation of New York being increased.

Mr. CONKLING. I am, of course, not arguing in favor of the voting basis; but I will say to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] that the table from which he reads was not, I think, made by the gentleman from Vermont, but by another. I have examined it with some care, and I have detected in it those errors which, when the gentleman comes to look at it, will show him that the table which I present is correct.

It has been said in aid of a voting basis that many of the abuses to which it would be liable could be prevented by restricting the enumeration to male citizens of the United States twenty years old and upward. This would prevent much abuse; but it would shut out four fifths of the citizens of the country—women and children, who are citizens, who are taxed, and who are, and always have been, represented. It would also narrow the basis of taxation, and in some States seriously.

The second plan mentioned, the proposition to prohibit States from denying civil or political rights to any class of persons, encounters a great objection on the threshold. It trenches upon the principle of existing local sovereignty. It denies to the people of the several States the right to regulate their own affairs in their own way. It takes away a right which has been always supposed to inhere in the States and transfers it to the General Government. It meddles with a right reserved to the States when the Constitution was adopted, and to which they will long cling before they surrender it. No matter whether the innovation be attempted in behalf of the negro race or any other race, it is confronted by the genius of our institutions. But more than this. The northern States, most of them, do not permit negroes to vote. Some of them have repeatedly and lately pronounced against it. Therefore, even if it were defensible as a principle for the General Government to absorb by amendment the power to control the action of the States in such a matter, would it not be futile to ask three quarters of the States to do for themselves and all others, by ratifying such an amendment, the very thing which most of them have already refused to do in their own cases? This step will be taken, if taken at all, as a last resort in the attainment of some object too wise and desirable to be opposed.

The third proposition is believed by the committee to avoid, as far as the case admits of, all the objections of the other two.

Let me read it as it will stand in the Constitution if adopted by Congress and three quarters of the States:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which shall be included in the Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by counting the whole number of persons in each State: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all individuals of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

It contains but one condition, and that rests upon a principle already imbedded in the Constitution, and as old as free government itself. That principle I affirmed in the beginning, namely, that representation does not belong to those who have not political existence, but to those who have. The object of the amendment is to enforce this truth. It therefore provides that whenever any State finds within its borders a race of beings unfit for political existence, that race shall not be represented in the Federal Government. Every State will be left free to extend or withhold the elective franchise on such terms as it pleases, and this without losing anything in representation if the terms are impartial as to all. Qualifications of voters may be required of any kind—qualifications of intelligence, of property, or of any sort whatever, and yet no loss of representation shall thereby be suffered. But whenever in any State, and so long as a race can be found which is so low, so bad, so ignorant, so stupid, that it is deemed necessary to exclude men from the right to vote merely because they belong to that race, in such case the race shall likewise be excluded from the sum of Federal power to which that State is entitled.

If a race is so vile or worthless that to belong to it is alone cause of exclusion from political action, the race is not to be counted here in Congress. That is all, and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] seems not altogether to appreciate the bearings of the subject.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment, that I may ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROGERS. Suppose that a State, in its organic law, should exclude the colored people from the right of voting, and should accompany that act by a preamble declaring that such exclusion was not on account of race or color, but was on account of the want of intelligence or education among the colored people; could that State, under this proposed amendment of the Constitution, have representation for its whole colored population?

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] knows as well as I do that that question has nothing but casuistry to recommend it, if it has that. He understands that any State composed of honest people properly outside a lunatic asylum, if they proposed a qualification for the sake of the qualification, and fairly to exclude all who could not come up to it, and to admit all who could, would make the qualification apply to all persons offering to vote, not to those only of a certain color; and then blacks and whites would equally fall under its operation. The instant a State says that a man of a certain race shall not vote because he is ignorant, but that a man of another race who is just as ignorant may vote, the exclusion is on account of race merely, whether it is honestly avowed or cunningly covered up. I am not now discussing the propriety of admitting or excluding races, but I am showing that there will never be difficulty in seeing whether the exclusion is in fact made or not.

Mr. ROGERS. A little further. Who is to judge of the intent of the framers of the organic act in excluding negroes from voting on account of want of intelligence, even though they say it is a mere pretext? Who is to judge in saying that it is a mere pretext?

Mr. CONKLING. The power called upon to decide the question; all questions arising upon the construction of laws go for decision to their appropriate forum. The question supposed would do so, and the forum would be Congress, and also, perhaps, the courts.

Mr. ROGERS. One more question. Suppose a State should by act of the Legislature pass a law saying that colored persons should not vote without a property qualification, would not that be contrary to the spirit and intent and letter of this amendment?

Mr. CONKLING. The proposition by its terms would mean that men not colored could vote without the qualification.

Mr. ROGERS. Has not a State the power to say what population shall vote, white or black?

Mr. CONKLING. I answer that under the pending amendment, if any State says that white men, because they are white men shall not vote unless they come up to certain qualifications, the distinction being against their race, white men would be excluded from the basis of representation. It is as broad as it is long, and cannot be tortured into any misunderstanding.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I have desired at some point to interrupt the gentleman and to ask him a question. I have been a little fearful that the last part of the amendment might be construed to give powers to the States regulating the matter of the elective franchise, which they did not even now possess, in the way of excluding an entire race from the right of the elective franchise. As our Constitution now is, we have at least this restraint on the power of the States, to wit, that they cannot so limit that franchise that the State shall cease to be republican, cease to be based upon the voice of the people. Now I was fearful—and I do not mean to take up the gentleman's time—the introduction of this clause, giving inferential power to the States to exclude a race, attaching as the only consequence that that exclusion should prevent them from being represented, might be mischievous by reason of authorizing States at pleasure to disfranchise whole races of men, and to concentrate the power in the few. This authorization of the disfranchisement of race being introduced into the Constitution might be held to modify the present sense of the clause relating to the States being republican, and might thus tend to lessen the power of the people. If worthy of it, I would like to hear the gentleman upon this matter.

Mr. CONKLING. Any suggestion from the gentleman from Ohio is always worthy of respect. He says the Constitution does contain one guaranty, at least, against such a contingency as he points to; and the whole strength of the argument is this: because the amendment says whenever any State shall deny or abridge the elective franchise on account of race and color, an implication is suggested in which there is danger.

If there is an implication, and if there is a recognition, or even an authorization such as the gentleman supposes, do we not see, at least, that nothing more is suggested than has always been permitted with universal acquiescence by the courts and the nation? The right to exclude class has been construed into the Constitution or in spite of the Constitution already, and all the restraint we now have would remain, I think.

To return to my argument, the pending proposition commends itself, it is thought, for many reasons.

First. It provides for representation coextensive with taxation.

I say it provides for this; it does not certainly secure it, but it enables every State to secure it. It does not, therefore, as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] insists, violate the rule that representation should go with taxation.

If a race in any State is kept unfit to vote, and fit only to drudge, the wealth created by its work ought to be taxed.

Those who profit by such a system, or such a condition of things, ought to be taxed for it. Let them build churches and school-houses, and found newspapers, as New York and other States have done, and educate their people till they are fit to vote.

"Fair play," "A fair day's wages for a fair day's work," "Live and let live"—these mottoes, if blazoned over the institutions of a State, will insure it against being cursed for any length of time with inhabitants so worthless that they are fit only for beasts of burden.

I have said that the amendment provides for representation going hand in hand with taxation. That is its first feature.

Second. It brings into the basis both sexes and all ages, and so it counteracts and avoids, as far as possible, the casual and geographical inequalities of population.

Third. It puts every State on an equal footing in the requirement prescribed.

Fourth. It leaves every State unfettered to enumerate all its people for representation or not, just as it pleases.

Thus every State has the sole control, free from all interference, of its own interests and concerns. No other State, nor the General Government, can molest the people of any State on the subject, or even inquire into their acts or their reasons, but all the States have equal rights.

If New York chooses to count her black population as political persons, she can do so. If she does not choose to do so the matter is her own, and her right cannot be challenged.

So of South Carolina. But South Carolina shall not say, "True, we have less than three hundred thousand 'persons' in this State, politically speaking, yet we will have in governing the country the power of seven hundred thousand persons."

The amendment is common to all States and equal for all; its operation will of course be practically only in the South. No northern State will lose by it, whether the southern States extend suffrage to blacks or not. Even New York, in her great population, has so few blacks that she could exclude them all from enumeration and it would make no difference in her representation.

If the amendment is adopted, and suffrage remains confined as it is now, taking the census of 1860 as the foundation of the calculation, and the number of Representatives as it then stood, the gains and losses would be these: Wisconsin, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Maine, would gain one Representative each, and New York would gain three; Alabama, Kentucky, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee, would each lose one; Georgia, Louisiana, and Virginia would each lose two, and Mississippi would lose three.

It has been insisted that "citizens of the United States" and not "persons" should be the basis of representation and apportionment.

These words were in the amendment as I originally drew it and introduced it, but my own judgment was that it should be "persons," and to this the committee assented.

There are several answers to the argument in favor of "citizens" rather than "persons." The present Constitution is, and always was, opposed to this suggestion. "Persons," and not "citizens," have always constituted the basis.

Again, it would narrow the basis of taxation and cause considerable inequalities in this respect, because the number of aliens in some States is very large, and growing larger now, when emigrants reach our shores at the rate of more than a State a year.

Again, many of the large States now hold their representation in part by reason of their aliens, and the Legislatures and people of these States are to pass upon the amendment. It must be made acceptable to them. For these reasons the committee has adhered to the Constitution as it is, proposing to add to it only so much as is necessary to meet the point aimed at.

I have thus, Mr. Speaker, endeavored to maintain a proposition to which I have given some thought, not, however, with a view to speaking upon it until within a few hours. I have passed over some things which might easily be said in its favor. It does not go as far as many persons think it ought, it goes further than many persons will admit it should.

I believe it a wise and salutary provision, a solid block needed in the foundation of our structure, for the sake of the white man and the black. Those who lend a helping hand to put it in its place will, I think, deserve well of their country. He who does most toward incorporating it in the Constitution may hope to be heir to the praise once not well bestowed, Urbem lateritium invenit, marmoriam reliquit.

Mr. HULBURD. I ask that by unanimous consent my colleague's time be extended.

Mr. STEVENS. I must object, inasmuch as the time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] was not extended.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not ask it of the House, as the time of the gentleman from New Jersey was not extended, although I desired to make some further suggestions.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise now to move to postpone the further consideration of this question until to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal, and that it be made the special order for that time. I move also that the resolution be printed.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask that the minority report be printed also.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to that. The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I will state, in favor of the motion to postpone until to-morrow, that early action upon the resolution is desirable for the reason that the Legislatures of twenty-one or twenty-two States are now in session, and among them that of California. The California Legislature will barely have time to receive this amendment and adopt it if we pass the resolution now, and her Legislature, if I am rightly informed, meets only once in two years. It must, therefore, be acted on during the present session or not at all. It is the same in Ohio, I am informed.

Mr. GRINNELL. And in Iowa.

Mr. STEVENS. And in Iowa and several other States. That is my reason for urging the speedy passage of this amendment, that we may get it before the people in time for the Legislatures of nineteen States to adopt it, and that is the number necessary. I now move the previous question on the motion to postpone.

Mr. GRIDER. I hope the gentleman will consent to postpone it for at least a day or two longer. We cannot get the amendment in print, so that we can examine it, before to-morrow.

Mr. STEVENS. I am only asking now that we shall go on with the matter to-morrow, that is all—that we shall proceed at that time to-morrow. I insist on the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof Mr. STEVENS's motion was agreed to.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. COBB. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of this Hall for this evening be granted to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union League, now in session in this city.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. COBB. I move a suspension of the rules to enable me to offer the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to wait until to-morrow, and then he can call it up.

Mr. COBB. The League will have adjourned to-morrow.

Mr. STEVENS. Is it for this evening?

Mr. COBB. It is.

The question was taken; and two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended.

The resolution was then received and adopted.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRENCH EXPOSITION.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back a joint resolution to provide for the expenses attending the exhibition of the products of the industry of the United States at the Exposition at Paris in 1867; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BANKS. I now ask that a day may be assigned for the consideration of the joint resolution—say Thursday of this week. It is important that it should be disposed of immediately, because if we are to take any part in that exposition, notice of it must be given to the country at once. It will take but a very short time to dispose of it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman can move to postpone till any day he pleases, but I object to any special order being made.

Mr. BANKS. I will ask, then, for a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are several special orders in the House and in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union which would ante-date this.

Mr. BANKS. I move to suspend the rules to make the joint resolution the special order for Thursday next, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. How much does the joint resolution appropriate?

Mr. BANKS. One hundred thousand dollars; but the outside expenditure the Government will be called upon to make is $50,000, a reimbursement of $50,000 being provided for, I think, in the resolution. The Committee on Foreign Affairs are unanimously of the opinion that so much Congress is bound to appropriate, inasmuch as it has accepted the invitation by the vote of both Houses.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and there were—ayes 69, noes 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. BANKS called for tellers, which were ordered, and Messrs. BANKS, and WASHBURNE of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 19.

So the rules were suspended, (two thirds voting in the affirmative,) and the motion to make the joint resolution the special order for Thursday next was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the House, in order that the same may be presented in the Senate, the papers of loyal citizens of Loudoun county, Virginia, praying for compensation for property destroyed by the military authority during the late rebellion. Leave was accordingly granted.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg leave to ask the attention of the House for a single moment. My colleague and friend from the first district of our State, [Mr. RANDALL,] in the course of his recent remarks did unintentional injustice to a gentleman who I know he esteems as highly as I do; and I wish to give that gentleman an opportunity to speak for himself, which will relieve him from the injustice which I feel has been done him.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent for the gentleman to do so at this time.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish only to read a few lines from the debates in the convention of Pennsylvania to show the position of my friend, Mr. Meredith, to whose opinions my colleague referred the other day. I will not detain the House many minutes.

Mr. ROSS. Very well; I withdraw my objection.

Mr. KELLEY. Speaking in the convention for amending the constitution of our State upon the question of suffrage, Mr. Meredith said:

"He denied that the right of suffrage depended upon other than political considerations, although he admitted it was a right which should be granted when it could be done consistently with the safety of the whole community. There were hundreds of whites who stood precisely in the same position as the blacks in reference to the right of suffrage. Notwithstanding the practice which had obtained in the State of Pennsylvania for the last half century, and although the judicial decisions which had been made were against the negroes having the right to vote, yet he did not desire to see a permanent exclusion of them from a participation in the elective franchise made in the constitution now undergoing amendment.

"As he had already said, he did not wish the right granted to the mass of them, but only those who possessed intelligence and property. He did not think there would be any objection on the part of the white population, generally, to this. He certainly had never heard any. On the other hand, he desired that something should be inserted in the constitution, either that they should not have the right of suffrage, or that they should, upon complying with certain conditions and being possessed of the necessary qualifications. He thought this might be done without interfering with the general principle that was advocated."

He believed in and advocated qualified colored suffrage; and I felt it was but right that he should be placed correctly before this House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire also to make a personal explanation.

No objection was made.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. In my remarks the other day I quoted the language of Mr. Meredith. My colleague [Mr. KELLEY] now quotes language which perhaps would seem to imply a different meaning from what I attributed to him. Now, sir, I ask the gentleman to refer to the vote given upon inserting the word "white" in the constitution, and inform the House whether Mr. Meredith's name is found recorded in favor of that insertion or not. I judge a man by his acts, and not by his arguments.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not examined his vote upon that subject.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I know you have not.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Meredith was in favor of qualified negro suffrage.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. He voted in favor of inserting the word "white" in the constitution of Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not examined that point. As my colleague referred to his opinions on the subject, I desired to let the country know what they were.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. You do not examine the whole subject, and you cannot throw light upon it. I have no doubt my other colleague, [Mr. STEVENS,] who was a member of that convention, can give the information I desire to obtain.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot speak upon that subject, for when the final vote was taken upon that question I was absent, being sick in Harrisburg.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I think the record, which I will produce here to-morrow, will show that Mr. Meredith did vote in favor of inserting the word "white" in the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. It is very likely; a great many did so vote.

SALE OF MARINE HOSPITALS, ETC.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, introduced a bill to authorize the sale of marine hospitals and revenue cutters; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

STATUE OF THE LATE PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire and report to this House with regard to the propriety and cost of procuring a marble statue of the late President Lincoln, to be placed in the Capitol.

PENSIONS FOR MISSOURI STATE MILITIA.

Mr. BENJAMIN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for extending the provisions of the pension laws to those who served in the Missouri State militia volunteers.

And then, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 23, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the memorial of the association of loyal Pennsylvanians, here in the city of Washington, asking Congress, as soon as possible, to confer upon all loyal citizens in this District the elective franchise, without distinction of color; and they protest most energetically against the conduct of the present board of aldermen and the city government of Washington on this subject. They protest against it as being an insolent imitation of the exploded doctrine of State rights, so far as they undertake to say that Congress, which has, under the Constitution, exclusive jurisdiction of the District of Columbia, must defer to the people of the District in enforcing a great act of justice. They set forth certain resolutions which have been tabled in the board of aldermen, tending to show that the board of aldermen are strongly adverse, as they express it, to the opinions of our late martyred President. I ask the reference of this document to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

It was so referred.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of citizens of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, praying that pensions may be granted to the sufferers by the explosion at the Alleghany arsenal on the 17th of September, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RIDDLE presented a petition of citizens of Wilmington, Delaware, praying that eight hours may be established as a legal day's work for all workmen, artisans, or other laborers in the employ of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of citizens of Osage county, Missouri, praying that a pension may be granted to Parellee Howerton, widow of Stern W. Howerton, who was killed by the rebels during Price's raid in that State in October, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS presented a memorial of citizens of St. Lawrence county, New York, remonstrating against the continuance or renewal of the so-called reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NORTON presented a memorial of the Mississippi River Improvement and Manufacturing Company, praying for a grant of lands to aid in improving the navigation of the Mississippi river to the falls of St. Anthony; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented a petition of citizens of Galveston, Texas, praying for the construction of a railroad through the Indian Territory, making it the south branch of the Union Pacific road, commencing at the northern line between Kansas and said Territory, at the junction of the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Fort Gibson road, or the nearest point to the Pacific road, running south to the south line of the Indian Territory at a point connecting with the Houston and Texas Central and Galveston and Houston roads; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. MORRILL presented the memorial of Paul Dudley and fifty-two others, citizens of Milford and Greenbush, in the State of Maine, remonstrating against the renewal of the so-called reciprocity treaty with the British Provinces, and against the formation of any new treaty which shall grant especial favors to the people of the Provinces not granted to other friendly nations; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a petition of citizens of Pike county, Missouri, praying for the appointment of properly qualified engineers for the examination of applicants for appointment as local inspectors of steamboats, and to examine into the qualifications of local engineers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have received and been requested to present twenty-seven petitions, signed by R. H. Smith, and some two thousand others, citizens, officers, and soldiers of the volunteer army, praying that the soldiers who were enlisted in the early part of the war in 1861 and 1862 may be paid the same bounties that those who enlisted subsequently in the years 1863, 1864, and 1865 received, alleging that their services were equally valuable to the country. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. CONNESS. I have received this morning by telegraph a preamble and resolutions, dated at Sacramento, California, January 19, and received at Washington this morning, the 23d, addressed directly to the delegation in the Senate and House of Representatives from California, but with the request that they be laid before both Houses of Congress, relating to the survey, sale, and disposition of the mineral lands, and particularly protesting against a bill introduced by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] for that purpose, setting forth the varied mischiefs and injuries that must necessarily result from the enactment of such a law as has been presented by that Senator to the interests and the vested and acquired rights of citizens of the State of California. I ask that the preamble and resolutions be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Received at Washington, January 23.]

SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA,
January 19, 1866.

To the delegation in Senate and House from California at Washington:

Whereas since the discovery of gold mines in California it has been the policy of the General Government to allow all those who desired to mine for the precious metals in this State a free and unrestricted right to search for and discover the same, and, when found, to hold and develop their claims subject only to such restrictions and rules as might be adopted by conventions held by those who were engaged in mutual mining enterprises in the several mining districts of the State; and whereas we believe that, by the adoption of that policy, the mining interests of the State have been developed more thoroughly, and to a much greater extent, than they would have been under any other policy that could have been adopted; and whereas legislation for the survey and sale of the mineral lands is threatened in the Congress of the United States, and it is seriously proposed to destroy the property interests which have been created in this State under the license of the General Government for seventeen years past, and to revolutionize the whole system of mining business and tenures under which the mines have been so far developed, the State has prospered, the Government has been supplied with the sinews of war, trade with advantageous markets, and the revenue a valuable and increasing resource: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the miners of California in general convention assembled, That we are opposed to any survey, lease, or sale of the mineral lands of this State, as injurious to the best interests of the General Government, and of this State, and utterly ruinous to the mining community.

Resolved, That any increase of the tax upon the proceeds of the mines would be onerous and injurious to the mining interests of this coast.

Resolved, That the bill introduced into the Senate of the United States by Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, of Ohio, is singularly calculated to work the utmost confusion and loss to the present holders of mining property, who have invested their labor and capital in developing the mines, to destroy the vast canal interests of the State, the existence of which is necessary to the protection of mining, and to expel the great bulk of the population of the mining districts from their homes, their business, and possessions.

Resolved, That the miners of California respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to respect the rights and property interests which the policy of the Government long continued has created and fostered.

Resolved, That we indorse the action of the Legislature of this State requesting delay in the issuance of patents to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, or another railroad company, until the Government has employed effective measures to segregate the mineral from the agricultural lands lying within the lines of the grant to the railroad company; and while willing and anxious to aid and encourage the construction of said road, the great national highway, we most emphatically protest against the cession of a vast section of mining and timber lands for that purpose, involving the sacrifice and destruction of private rights already vested.

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the president of this convention, the said president to act as chairman thereof, to prepare a memorial to Congress embodying the sentiments contained in these resolutions, and to cause the same to be presented through our delegation in Congress to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, and Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forthwith forwarded by the officers of the convention to each of our Senators and members of Congress, with the request of the convention that the same be laid before their respective Houses of Congress.

A. A. SARGENT,
President Miners' Convention.
MARCUS D. BARRICK,
Secretary.

W. B. EWER,
Assistant Secretary.
W. A. SELKIRK,
Assistant Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that this document be printed, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire that that communication shall be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which has the whole subject under consideration; and perhaps I ought to reply in a few words to one or two observations made by the petitioners. Those who telegraph this long communication are simply petitioners. I did not understand the Senator in his statement to say they were residents of California, but I presume they are citizens of San Francisco and of his State. The bill introduced by me the other day simply provides for the extension of our land-law system to the mineral lands of the United States. Under the present system there are no means by which a title can be acquired to mineral lands, unless it is under some old Mexican grant or under a possessory right, according to their mining laws or customs. The whole purpose of the bill is to extend our general land system to the mineral lands of the United States. The bill was mainly prepared by a former Commissioner of Public Lands, now one of the high officers of the Government. My conviction has been from the beginning that the best disposition that could be made of these lands is at once to secure to private persons absolute title to them, to grant the fee. The old policy of this Government, of the Spanish Government, and many other Governments has been to hold within the power of the Government the title to mineral lands. My own impression has always been that it would be wiser for the Government of the United States to give this land away to the settler rather than to hold the legal title. But I do believe that the mineral lands are a legitimate source of revenue, and that, with the aid of wise officers, we might derive a considerable revenue from the sale of the lands after they have been carefully surveyed. Whether the price per acre fixed by the bill that I have introduced is too high or not is a question for future discussion.

The whole purpose of the bill, it seems to me, has been entirely misunderstood by certain persons in the mining region. I believe if that bill, or a bill of a kindred character, were passed, by which the United States would invest in the occupants of these lands an absolute title, so that they might have an inducement to go on and make permanent improvements and develop the resources of the country, that California, Nevada, and all the mining States would rapidly grow far beyond their present limits. The truth is, that in all mining countries the trouble has been that the population is simply temporary. It is so in California. It is sometimes very prosperous and then sometimes very depressed. There is no fixed and permanent population in the mining region because there is no absolute title to the land, and the greatest improvements, from all the information I can get, are on the Mexican grants, where an absolute title was acquired under the Mexican law.

This being a subject relating solely to the public lands—the mines are considered merely as an incident to the public lands—I think this communication should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which has now charge of the bill that I introduced. The paper relates entirely to that bill, and the two ought to go together. The subject of mines and mining and minerals is another subject to be considered by its appropriate committee. I, therefore, move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moved that this communication be printed and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining. As an amendment to that motion, the Senator from Ohio moves to strike out "the Committee on Mines and Mining," and to insert in lieu thereof "the Committee on Public Lands," and the question is on the amendment to the motion.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to say in connection with the amendment of the honorable Senator to refer this communication to the Committee on Public Lands in preference to the Committee on Mines and Mining, that, personally, I have no feeling in regard to it. It is well known to the Senate that at the head of the committee to which I proposed to refer it the Senate has seen fit to place myself. It is true, as the Senator states, that the bill complained of in this preamble and these resolutions is now in possession of the Committee on Public Lands. I thought when the honorable Senator moved to refer it there, that it was not the committee most fit and proper to consider it. While it involved a question of the disposition of the public domain, it at the same time peculiarly involved the question of the tenure and present possession, and all the value that citizens of the United States engaged in mining pursuits had given to a very large district of country, and it very materially differed from a simple question of the disposition of the public land in the ordinary acceptance of that term; and therefore I thought at the time that the disposition made of the bill was not the most fit and proper; but it was not for me to say anything upon the occasion, and I did not.

Now, I have no objection that the disposition proposed by the Senator shall be made, because I have no question, so far as the Committee on Public Lands of this body is concerned, that they will conclude that the bill introduced by the honorable Senator is not the best calculated to dispose properly of the question which it comprehends. Of course I exonerate the Senator from Ohio from all the blame that may be directly or indirectly imputed to him in connection with the introduction of the measure, as to any intent to do anything but the very best for the country and for even the population of the mining regions; but I humbly submit to the Senator now that gentlemen residing out of the mining regions cannot be acquainted with a thousand conditions that exist, and that are important to be considered, within those regions and precincts. I undertake to say now that what is stated in regard to this bill in these resolutions is strictly true; that if the provisions of it were enacted into a law it would lead not simply to inextricable confusion, but it would lead even to revolution in that country, or in any mining country.

The Senator himself, I am well satisfied, is not aware of the injurious tendency, the destructive tendency, of many of the provisions of the bill, which proposes to put up at public auction and sell to the highest bidder the possessions of citizens of the United States in which their all is now invested.

But it is not proper to discuss the merits of the question of the disposition of the public lands upon this motion to refer. In justice to the petitioners and in justice to myself and my relation to the subject, and to the bills that are now before this body and in committee, or that may be presented hereafter, I felt it due to say something on the subject. If the honorable Senator will withdraw his amendment, I shall withdraw my motion and let this paper go at present to the Committee on Public Lands. Yet I submit to him and to the Senate now that the Committee on Public Lands is scarcely the committee to consider the question of the disposition of the mines of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly have no desire to withdraw the subject of mines and mining from the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. CONNESS. I am aware of that.

Mr. SHERMAN. No doubt they are well prepared to consider the subject; but the bill which I introduced relates not only to the mineral lands but also to the farming lands of the United States, which are supposed to be to the mines, even in the mining countries, as ten to one, the great body of the land even in mining countries being passed over there as waste land or as farming land. A very small proportion, probably, would be classed as mineral land; but the whole must be surveyed and sold together; and therefore the bill properly goes to the Committee on Public Lands. At the suggestion of the honorable Senator I withdraw my amendment, and will allow the reference to be made to the Committee on Public Lands, at his instance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn. Does the Chair understand the motion to be that the document be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and printed?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 88) to restrict the expenses of collecting soldiers' claims against the Government, reported it with amendments.

PROPERTY AT POINT LOOKOUT.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 40) directing the Secretary of War to postpone the sale of public property at Point Lookout, Maryland, have directed me to report that it ought not to pass. I should like to have it acted upon at this time, and I move the indefinite postponement of the resolution.

Mr. CRESWELL. I have no objection to the present consideration of the resolution; but I should be glad to learn from the gentleman, as the representative of the committee, upon what grounds they have decided to recommend that the resolution be rejected.

Mr. WILSON. If it is to be debated, I think it had better go over. I will say, however, that the committee, on consultation with the Department which has the care of these matters, came to the conclusion that no action of Congress ought to be had on the subject. It is understood that the persons incorporated to establish a soldiers' asylum or home do not believe that to be a proper place, and it will not be accepted by them or used for that purpose. The committee think this matter ought to be left where the law now leaves it, in the War Department, to be dealt with by that Department according to its convictions of what the interests of the country require. The committee have therefore reported against the passage of the resolution; but if the Senator from Maryland does not want it acted upon at this time I shall certainly not press it now.

Mr. CRESWELL. I prefer that it should go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be laid over.

Mr. WILSON. The same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Mrs. Delphine P. Baker, praying Congress to appropriate the Government buildings at Point Lookout as a national military and naval asylum, ask to be discharged from its further consideration. I suppose the question may as well be taken now.

Mr. CRESWELL. As that is part of the same measure, I ask that it also go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Maryland that discharging the committee does not discharge the subject from the consideration of the Senate. If the Senator from Massachusetts asks that the question be taken at this time, the Chair will put the question.

Mr. CRESWELL. I have no objection that the request of the Senator, so far as that is concerned, shall be granted. All that I desire is that the papers shall be retained for consideration by the Senate hereafter.

The request of the committee was granted.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 94) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of seamen and others borne on the books of vessels wrecked or lost in the naval service," approved July 4, 1864, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 95) providing for the appointment of a commission to purchase a site and erect a building for a post office, custom-house, and for holding the courts of the United States, in the city of St. Paul; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 96) authorizing an increase of the clerical force in the Post Office Department; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 23) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America, and ordered to be printed. The amendment proposed is as follows:

No State, in prescribing the qualifications requisite for electors therein, shall discriminate against any person on account of color or race.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. SUMNER. I gave notice the other day that I would, when the bill (S. No. 74) for the admission of the State of Colorado into the Union came up, move an amendment to it. As the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] gave notice that he would call the bill up tomorrow, I send the amendment to the Chair, and ask that it be printed.

The amendment was received informally, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON. I ask leave to offer a section which is to be introduced as an amendment to the bill (S. No. 71) relative to the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit, introduced by me a few days since. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. NESMITH, it was Ordered, That the two several petitions of Captain John Mullan, late of the United States Army, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, it was Ordered, That the heirs of Dr. Sylvester Nash and Sarah Nash have leave to withdraw their petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That Jonathan Ball have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, since I have been a member of this body, questions relating to the institution of slavery have so frequently come before it, and I have mingled in the debates upon those questions so often, that I had determined when I came to take my seat in the body this winter not to participate again in debates upon them. But, sir, we were told the other day by the honorable Senator from Illinois, who has this bill in charge, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] that there was a necessity for including my State within the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau; and as my State is, according to the provisions of the bill and the declarations of that honorable chairman, to be included within it, I must crave the indulgence of the Senate while for a few minutes I examine some of its provisions. The language of the honorable Senator was:

"It is necessary, Mr. President, to extend the Freedmen's Bureau beyond the rebel States in order to take in the State of Delaware, the loyal State of Delaware. I am happy to say, which did not engage in this wicked rebellion, and it is necessary to protect the freedmen in that State as well as elsewhere; and that is the reason for extending the Freedmen's Bureau beyond the limits of the rebellious States."

On the 3d of March last the Congress of the United States passed an act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Freedmen and Refugees." It was not deemed necessary then, although war raged in the land, to extend the operations of this bureau to any other States than those which were denominated States in revolt. But, sir, as success has crowned the efforts of the persistent friends of the negro race their aggressive movements have become more rapid and more extensive.

Mr. President, although the Freedmen's Bureau, as originally established, was only intended according to its provisions, to extend to the States that had assumed to secede, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact what a great, what an extensive bureau it has become in the country. I shall enter into no computation of the cost which the country has already incurred in the support of that bureau. One thing we know, that hundreds and thousands of the negro race have been supported out of the Treasury of the United States, and you and I and the white people of this country are taxed to pay that expense. For the first time in the history of this country has the thing occurred, that the great mass of the people have been taxed to support in idleness a class who are too lazy or too worthless to support themselves. Sir, look around upon these galleries at any time of the day, and you see the beneficiaries of this Freedmen's Bureau crowding your galleries and listening to the debates of this body. How many of the honest, hard-working, white young men of this country are there who can afford to come to the city of Washington, sit day after day, week after week, month after month, and listen to your d. 'liberations? Sir, they cannot afford to do it, but under the protecting care of this Freedmen's Bureau your galleries can be crowded with hundreds of negroes every day listening to your deliberations, doing nothing to support themselves, but being supported out of the taxes levied upon the white people of the country.

Now, sir, the bill under consideration proposes to enlarge the powers of this bureau; it does enlarge them wonderfully. I think that I can demonstrate by mathematical calculation that this bill gives to the President of the United States and to those entrusted with the discharge of its duties, the power of expending at least $250,000,000. As I said the other day, it may not be the intention of the friends of the bill that such an enormous expenditure shall be incurred, but we are to look at what may be the result of this bill's going into operation, to ascertain what the expense may be, and not to consider that those entrusted with the discharge of its duties may not incur this expense.

The first section of the bill extends the operation of the Freedmen's Bureau throughout the United States, and includes within its provisions all the States of this Union, instead of letting it be confined, as heretofore, to the States which were in revolt. Now, sir, I wish to show to the Senate and to the country what are the dangerous powers entrusted to this Freedmen's Bureau, and to those who shall have the management of it. You will recollect, Mr. President, that the original bill provided for the appointment of one Commissioner with a salary of $3,000, with the privilege of having under him clerks at a certain salary. This bill provides that there may be districts formed not exceeding twelve out of the whole number of States in the Union, and that "there shall be an assistant commissioner for each district with like salary." That, as I stated the other day, would amount to the sum of $36,000. It provides, also, that these twelve districts may be subdivided by the President of the United States so as to make the sub-districts within the whole limits of the United States one for each county or parish in the United States.

The number of counties in the United States is eighteen hundred and seventy-eight I believe, as corrected by my friend, the Senator from Kentucky, exclusive of the two new States recently admitted. There being, then, that number of counties in the United States, and this bill giving to the President of the United States the power to appoint an agent for every one of those counties at a salary of $1,600 each, there would be an expenditure of $2,817,000. Then there are seventy-two clerks of assistant commissioners which this bill provides for, at $1,200 each, and they would amount to $86,400. Then thirty-seven hundred and fifty-eight clerks of agents, (for the bill gives the power to appoint these assistant commissioners, these agents, and clerks for them,) would amount to $4,507,600, making the cost under this bill to the people of the United States for officers alone $7,442,000.

What a magnificent bill this would be for a presidential election. With all these agencies appointed by the Executive of the United States interested in his reelection, or in the success of the candidate of the party of which he might be a member, what a powerful political engine it would be to operate upon such an election.

But, sir, this is not all the expense that will be incurred by this bill. Another section requires that there shall be three million acres of land assigned in certain States in the South for these freedmen; and, mark you, the negro is a great favorite in the legislation of Congress, and the bill provides that it shall be "good land." No land is to be provided for the poor white men of this country, not even poor land; but when it comes to the negro race three million acres must be set apart, and it must be "good land" at that. I know that the bill provides that this land shall be rented to the negro; but those of you who have observed the thriftiness and skill with which the negro population manage their agricultural operations, will find that when Sambo comes to pay his rent his rent will be pretty much like the rent of the individual who, when his landlord called upon him for his one third of the produce of the farm, said, "Sir, I did not produce a third." He will raise nothing to pay the rent. I estimate the rental value of those three million acres of your land at five dollars per acre, and the free negroes of the country are to be entitled to $15,000,000 more in the way of rental of lands; for no one can suppose that their benevolent and faithful friends of the Republican party will ever collect any rents from them, least of all that any such rents will ever be received into the Treasury of the United States.

The bill provides that these three million acres shall be in allotments of forty acres each, and each freedman is to have a farm of good land of forty acres; and you do not propose to put the negro upon his little farm of forty acres without a house to live in, because your bill provides in another section that they shall be provided with shelter. Then, after having given him forty acres of good land to live upon, what will it cost to build a very moderate dwelling-house, with necessary out-houses, for this favorite of the legislation of Congress? Not less than $300, because the negro race now think, at least, that they are equal to the white race, and they have a right to believe, considering the legislation of Congress and the laudation which we hear every day of them, that they are a little better. The erection of these buildings will require an additional expenditure of $22,500,000. Sir, the time was when it was said that a white man, provided he behaved himself, was as good as a negro; but, looking at the legislation of Congress and the tone of the public press of the northern States, I think we shall have to come to the conclusion that even if the white man does behave himself, he is not quite as good as the negro, for you find no bills introduced in Congress to furnish homes and houses to the white men of this country, whether poor or rich.

But, sir, this is not the only expense. You say in this bill that these negroes shall be furnished with provisions, medicines, &c. When you look around upon your own galleries and see the free negroes who are living out of the bounty of the Freedmen's Bureau sitting here every day witnessing your deliberations, do you suppose that the freedmen contemplated by this bill are going to work when others who are living out of the Freedmen's Bureau are witnessing every day the proceedings of Congress? Certainly not. I estimate, then, that to these four million freedmen you would have to give the small sum of fifty dollars each; and that would be a very small sum. This would require a further expenditure of $200,000,000.

Your bill does not stop there; but this enfranchised race must be schooled; and your bill provides that there shall be school-houses, ay, and asylums, too, erected for them. I suppose that of the freedmen of the United States there will be nearly a million, including the children and those who are grown, who need schooling, and whom it will be necessary to educate; and mark you, the extent of the supplies is left discretionary with the Commissioner; he may expend this money at his discretion. Well, sir, how many pupils will there be, and how many school-houses will be required? I suppose, first, there will be a million pupils, young and old, of this whole race; and I suppose it would cost twenty dollars each to school them. That would take $20,000,000. I suppose it would take thirty thousand school-houses, and your bill authorizes the building of these houses, and that each school will cost $300. Here is an additional item of expense amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $9,000,000.

Then, after the negro has his house built for him and his forty acres of land allotted to him, he has not the means, you tell us, of providing for himself; his farm must be stocked, and your bill, under the clause for "furnishing the necessary provisions," gives the power to stock it. What will that cost? I suppose it will cost $300 to each of the seventy-five thousand farms, which will amount to the further trifling sum of $22,500,000.

Thus, sir, we see that the amount of expenditure authorized under the provisions of this bill, or the loss to the Government under it, may be no less than $295,000,000, and cannot reasonably be supposed to be less than $250,000,000.

These, briefly, are some of my objections to this bill; but it is coupled with another bill which we are told is to be passed as soon as this shall have been carried through the Senate. That is a bill (No. 61) "to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication." The power to pass this bill, I suppose, is claimed to exist under the second clause of the act amendatory of the Constitution abolishing slavery, that section providing that Congress may, by appropriate legislation, carry that amendment into effect. And now, sir, here comes the most dangerous bill of the two. It declares:

"That there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; but the inhabitants of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

For the first time in the history of the legislation of this country it is attempted by Congress to invade the States of this Union, and undertake to regulate the law applicable to their own citizens. The authority to enact such a law is claimed under the second section of the act providing for the amendment of the Constitution. Can it be possible that any person can conceive that under that section such an extensive power as that now claimed is actually given? By it Congress was authorized "by appropriate legislation" to carry the amendment into effect. What was the amendment? An amendment abolishing the status or condition of slavery, which is nothing but a status or condition which subjects one man to the control of another, and gives to that other the proceeds of the former's labor. Cannot that amendment be carried into effect, and the status of freedom established, without exercising such a power as this? I say here, as I have said before, that when that constitutional amendment was under consideration in this Chamber, there was no friend of the measure who claimed or avowed that such a power as this existed in Congress under it. This bill goes on and provides for the punishment of—"Any person who under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject or cause to be subjected any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by this act, or to different punishment, pains, or penalties on account of such person having at any time been held in a condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of white persons."

It declares that that shall be a misdemeanor, and shall subject the party so offending to a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. It then by its provisions gives the power to commissioners, to be appointed by the court, to cause to be arrested, and to appoint agents who may cause to be arrested, any persons who shall violate its provisions, and it rewards each commissioner, the number of whom is to be increased, with a fee of ten dollars for every case he shall hear, and every agent who shall cause any person to be arrested is to receive the sum of five dollars for his trouble, and other additional costs if he shall incur any. When the fugitive slave law was under discussion, because there was a provision in it giving to the commissioner a fee for his decisions under that law, a wonderful clamor was raised throughout the country by gentlemen who are now in favor of this bill in reference to the horrid provision of the fugitive slave law in this respect. But, sir, the fugitive slave law had reference to negroes and this bill to the punishment of white men. This bill provides that the determination of questions arising under it, and under the bill establishing the Freedmen's Bureau, shall not be heard and determined by the State courts, but shall be taken from the State courts and given to the district courts of the United States. This bill authorizes the arrest and imprisonment of any and every white man in the United States who may be charged with the violation of any right attempted to be secured by it to a negro, and offers a bounty of five dollars to any miserable wretch who shall make the arrest. Can infamy in legislation go further? One only step, and this bill takes it, for it denies a trial to the accused in the courts of his State.

But to return to the bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

What are the arguments presented in favor of this bill? I have heard none attempted, except by one Senator, upon this floor, and that was the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.] The Senator from Illinois argues the right to make the appropriation contained in this bill from the fact that we have made appropriations for the Indians; on the ground, also, that this class of people has been thrown upon us by the results of the war, and are incapable of protecting themselves; and he claims for it authority under that provision of the Constitution which gives Congress the right to declare war, to raise and support armies, and to maintain a navy. He says it is not designed for times of peace, but that it is a branch of the War Department, and is meant only for times of war; and we are told by that honorable Senator that the war has not ceased, although hostilities have ceased; and he quotes in support of that view the declaration of the honorable Attorney General of the United States, who admits, in the opinions he gave, that hostilities have ceased, but says the war has not ceased. I should like to inquire what is war but a state of hostilities; and if a state of hostilities does not exist how can there be war? Is it a war of words? I thought war meant the meeting in deadly array upon the field of battle; and I never had the idea before that it was possible for a war to exist between two nations or two people when there were in fact no hostilities.

But, sir, the President of the United States, the highest executive officer of your Government, has said to you in a message delivered here that the war has ceased and that civil government is now in operation in all the seceded States. Even this bill, whatever may be the theories of some of the members of the dominant party, treats all the States that assumed to secede from the Union as existing members of the Union, and proposes to legislate in a different manner for States, which the bill upon its face admits to be States in the Union, from what it does in reference to other States in the Union. When was it ever heard of before that the Congress of the United States had, in reference to some States of the Union, they admitting them to be States in the Union, more comprehensive legislative power than they had in reference to others? If they be States in the Union, how does it happen that they are States with unequal rights and unequal privileges? Do we hear of any such thing as that in the Constitution of the United States? Is any such sentiment as that to be found in the writings of any of the founders of the Government? No, sir; it is a modern doctrine. The war is to be considered as continuing for certain purposes, and for none other; the States are to be considered as in the Union for certain purposes, and not in the Union for other purposes; and it was foreshadowed yesterday in the speech of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] that when he procured additional guarantees, and when the objects and aims of the party of which he is so distinguished a leader shall be more fully accomplished, then these States are to be represented in this Chamber and a general amnesty proclaimed. Sir, if the States which assumed to secede be States in the Union, as is contemplated by this bill itself, where have you the right to exclude them from an equal representation on this floor? The Constitution of the United States declares that each State shall be entitled to two Senators in Congress. If, then, they be States in the Union, what right is there in this body to exclude them from representation? None whatever.

I pass by, therefore, the argument of the honorable Senator, that this legislation is to be justified under that provision of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to declare war. Sir, your Constitution never did give to Congress the power to declare war against any State of this Union, and when the word is used and the power named in the Constitution, it is meant only to apply to the power of Congress to declare war against a foreign Power.

But, sir, the honorable Senator says that the war continues because the President of the United States has refused to make proclamation that there shall be an end to the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. If that be true, then it is in the power of the President of the United States to continue a war simply by withholding a proclamation declaring that the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus no longer exists. The argument is not worthy of a serious answer, however respectable and learned the source from whence it comes. But as I have mentioned that matter, I will take occasion to repeat what I have said before, that the former President of the United States, in my judgment, never had at any time any authority to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. It is true the Congress of the United States passed an act authorizing him to suspend it, but that was delegating a power to the President of the United States which could only be exercised by themselves.

But, sir, if this war has not ceased where is the evidence of its continuance? Does a hostile foot tread the soil of the United States to-day? Is there an armed foe within all our borders? Not one. Peace is within all our borders. Your foes have been subdued, have submitted, and calmly acquiesce in the will of the victor. When in reorganizing their State governments unreasonable and unwarranted exactions were made of them by the executive authority they yielded to them without a murmur, and performed every act which they could reasonably suppose would be required of them. Still, sir, they are not in this and the other Hall of Congress with a refusal to allow their participation in legislation, notwithstanding they are subjected to taxation, the worst species of tyranny, and which led to and justified our great American Revolution; and we are modestly told that they are to give further and irreversible guarantees for their good behavior in the future. If such a guarantee be the granting by them of the elective franchise to the negro race, I frankly say that whatever they may do, if I were placed in like circumstances, I never would give it.

We were told by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] yesterday that the party in power have a great mission to perform, and those who were opposed to its objects and its aims had only to stand out of the way and let it accomplish its purpose. He referred to the fact how the Whig party had gone down under this modern spirit which actuates the party to which he belongs, how the Democratic party has been overthrown, and how his party is now on the high-road to success. He told us of the wonderful things that it has accomplished. He told us that it had lifted and raised this country in the eyes of all Christian people to the very heights of heaven in comparison to the position which it sustained before.

Sir, what has his party done? This party of yesterday, with no record except during the last five or six years, when it came into power, found a united country extending from ocean to ocean, and from the frozen regions of the north to the sunny plains of the south. It found the Government administered at an expense to the people of this whole country of only some sixty or seventy million dollars. It found peace, happiness, and contentment everywhere. No foreign nation insulted your flag. No foreign minister said to your Secretary of State and to your President, "Send a ship-of-war, and put on board one of our vessels two men whom you have wrongfully taken from them." There was no sound of arms within the limits of the whole country. This Republican party succeeded to power, and what has occurred? They foresaw that their policy, if pursued, would lead to a temporary, if not a final disruption of the American Union. They had the power in their hands to prevent the effusion of a single drop of blood. They were besought by the people, North and South, East and West, to prevent the effusion of blood. They were deaf to all the calls of their countrymen, and they, uniting with men whose passions their course had aroused, plunged this country in all the horrors of a civil war. Nearly a million of your countrymen, North and South, have fallen a sacrifice to the triumph and the success of the principles of the Republican party, and a debt of $4,000,000,000 now weighs down the industry of the American people. Every house has been clothed in mourning; every eye almost has been dimmed with tears. That has been the penalty that the American people have paid for the success and the triumph to which the Senator alluded.

Sir, that is not all that his party has done. There is not a constitutional right of the people of this country that his party has not invaded, either through its Executive or its Congress, or some one of its departments or branches. Sir, be it spoken to the credit of the Democratic party, that while it was in power, no man, however humble, within the limits of the United States was ever arrested or tried except according to law; no single newspaper was ever suppressed; no domicile of the humblest citizen was ever invaded. All these violations of the constitutional rights of the people of the States have taken place since the ascendancy of the party to which the Senator belongs to power.

But, Mr. President, I am not surprised that the honorable Senator should profess to have no unkind feelings toward the southern people. I am not surprised that he should be willing, not only in the kindness of his heart, but in the coolness of his judgment, to grant a general amnesty when he can receive a few more guarantees. Secession is not a doctrine of southern origin, and well may the Senator feel no unkindness for pupils, those who believed in it. Where did secession have its origin? In the South? No, sir. If an ex-President of the United States from the Senator's own State is a credible witness, there existed within the limits of his own State, and of his own dear New England, which I shall not attack, for it is not my province to say an unkind word against any of the States of this Union, and I do not presume to do so—but if John Quincy Adams be a credible witness, there existed, as far back as 1803 and 1804, a design among leading men in the section of country from which the Senator comes to dissolve this Union; and he affirmed as lately as 1828 that that design had gone so far as that its advocates had agreed upon a military leader, and that in case of civil war the power of Great Britain was to be invoked to aid them. In further proof that the doctrine of secession is not of southern origin, the honorable Senator has only to consult the records of the debates of Congress in 1811, and he will find there that when a bill was presented to the Congress of the United States for the admission of Louisiana into the Union, Josiah Quincy, from his own State, avowed upon the floor of Congress that the passage of that bill would absolve his section of the Union from any obligation to remain in it. Sir, while the recollection of the Hartford Convention continues it is well that the men of New England should not too harshly judge secessionists.

Massachusetts has not been alone in favoring this doctrine. Another one of the free States of this country has produced a bright and shining light in the law, who has also declared in favor of the right of secession. I refer, without troubling the Senate with a citation from the book, to Mr. Rawle's Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, in which he distinctly avows the right of a State to secede.

I only allude to these facts to show that it was very natural for the Senator from Massachusetts to express the opinion that he did not wish the effusion of any more blood, because the very doctrine from which the war has resulted, with the cooperation of other doctrines of which the Senator is the advocate, had their origin in his own section of the country.

One other remark, and I shall trouble the Senate no longer. It is supposed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and those who cooperate with him, that the Democratic party of this country has gone down in the dust, and that his party is to continue in the future as in the past four years, in power. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Guthrie] yesterday, referring to that remark, reminded the Senator from Massachusetts that in the last presidential election the Democratic candidate received eighteen hundred thousand votes. And, sir, when you recollect against what the Democratic party had to contend—bayonets in Maryland, bayonets in Delaware, bayonets in Kentucky, bayonets in Missouri, and the Treasury of this country—I ask you if it is not reasonable to suppose that had that party been free from such opposition as this it would have succeeded in that contest? But, sir, pass your present bills, pass your negro-suffrage bills, carry out your doctrine that the negro is not only the equal, but the superior of the white man, and is to be supported at the expense of the white man, and I have no doubt that the Democratic party, which the Senator supposes to be dead, will rise again, and that this Hall, and the Hall of the other House, will be filled with the members of that party.

One word to my Democratic friends. What is their duty in this emergency? It is to stand fast and firmly by their principles and to their party organization, to be true to themselves, and their course will meet with the approval of their own judgment in the future, and will be crowned with success.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I design to say a few words, perhaps not very much upon the bill itself, although the bill has given me some little trouble in considering it.

The honorable Senator who has just spoken, in the close of his remarks prophesies that if we proceed in the system of measures that we have decided upon, the Democratic party will very soon be in possession of both Halls of Congress. I do not know that I should hesitate a great while in doing that which I thought to be right and just even in view of such a calamity. I acknowledge the force of the prophecy in one sense; and that is, that when he tells us such will be the result, I feel that the innumerable evils that would follow from it are such as might well make us pause. If I really believed that such a consummation was to come about in any short time from any system of measures we have adopted or were about to adopt, I should dread so much the evils that would follow, that perhaps I might hesitate. I do not apprehend, however, that that calamity is so near at hand that an apprehension of it ought to influence my action on measures that I think to be proper and just in themselves.

Now, sir, let us look for a single instant upon the condition in which we find ourselves. We are at the close of a great war, and a war that was brought upon us by the Democratic party. The great mass of the Democratic party, the leading portion of it, was the southern portion. I do not say that all the Democrats were in favor of the war. I acknowledge that a very great portion of them have proved themselves to be good and true patriots, as good and true patriots and as good friends to their country as any set of men, but I do say that the support which the Democratic party gave to the South, in all its measures of aggression, was a degree of encouragement without which I do not believe the war ever would have occurred. That has been my opinion always, and I have no hesitation in expressing it now.

If the war was brought upon us by the South, and a result has followed which may be afflicting to them for a series of years, even in the matter of money appropriations as well as in other respects, it is not for them to complain. They initiated it; they drove us into the necessity which led to it; and if the result is disastrous and continues to be oppressive, so far as necessary measures are concerned, they have themselves to thank for it, and cannot complain of the Congress of the United States if it takes measures to set all things right. And if the great Democratic party, as a party, by its previous course, is responsible in any degree for it, by way of encouragement it afforded or otherwise, it is not even for that party as a party to complain of the measures which may be found necessary at the present time. They also have taken the consequences of their action to a certain extent, and I think they ought to be silent upon everything which is a natural and necessary and inevitable result of the contest for which they, in a degree, were responsible.

Mr. McDUGALL. Will the Senator allow me to make a single interrogation? The great Democratic party have been the maintainers of the Union from the time when trouble first came until triumph was accomplished; and it cannot be said with any justice by any gentleman on the floor of the Senate or otherwise that they have failed to maintain the integrity of the Union with their blood and with their strength; and it cannot be accredited to any persons who call themselves antagonists to the Democratic party that they have been better maintainers of this Union, from the center all around to the circumference. I make that remark as a challenge to the Senator's observation, claiming what may not be properly claimed. Braver men never came from any country than from his, from the pine woods of Maine, but Democrats came from there as well as Republicans; and the Democrats from the East and the West, going down upon the South, were equally armed with his political friends. I do not claim any privilege for them, although I have been proud that Democrats were in the advance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That seems to be rather a speech than an explanation.

Mr. McDUGALL. Not a speech, but I do not like the remark that you made and the challenge you threw down.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator, or any other Senator, does not like the remarks I make he is at liberty to reply, not to interrupt me for the sake of interjecting his own opinions.

Mr. McDUGALL. I shall not interrupt the Senator again.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall be very much obliged to the Senator if he will not. My opinions I express. I made a distinction—I am very happy to make it—between the individuals composing the rank and file of the Democratic party, many of them, and the acts of the party in advance of the war. That is a totally different question. That the great mass of the Democrats at the North have shown themselves lovers of their country and have entered into this contest and fought bravely and served bravely, and, more than all, sustained the Government throughout in the most manly and patriotic way, and are doing it to this day, I freely acknowledge. I was speaking of previous acts. As my friend at my elbow [Mr. CLARK] observes, what killed the Democratic party was that the mass of them would not follow their leaders.

I am not apt to talk politics on this floor, and I have merely made this statement in reply to what was said by the honorable Senator from Delaware.

Now, permit me to say, we hear a great many threats of the disruption of the Union party; of the overthrow we are to experience; of the good time that is coming for those who are not having the most agreeable time in the world. Well, sir, perhaps it may come. It is not for me to say that it will not. Perhaps the great party which has the control of the country at the present time will commit such errors that the people will get tired and wish for a change. Nothing is more natural. The possession of power for a long time is apt to make men careless, if not corrupt, and it is a good thing in a republic that the people can change, and do see fit to change, from time to time, their rulers. But let me say to that Senator and to others, that we hope the party in power now will continue long enough to set things right, so that when there is a change there will not be so great a capacity for evil as there would have been had we not remained in power so long. We will endeavor to strengthen the country if we cannot strengthen ourselves, and that is all that good patriots ought to ask. We will do what we can for the public good while we remain in power, and not be frightened from that by the idea that our reign is to be a short one. Short or long, I hope it will be honorable.

The honorable Senator from Delaware has renewed the charges of our having broken the Constitution all along from the beginning, violated constitutional provisions, had Federal bayonets at the polls in several States, &c. Why, sir, the honorable Senator and other Senators are on record upon that subject here and before the country over and over again. It has been the cry from the beginning, from the very inception five years ago very nearly, of the power which we then attained. What effect has it produced upon the public mind? Can gentlemen flatter themselves that they have frightened anybody? Can they flatter themselves that they have created the least alarm? Can they flatter themselves that they have gained strength by it? Are they stronger to-day than they have been at any previous time since the accession of the Republican party to power? It does not look so to me. If such is the fact, I should like to have them point to the record of it, and if they cannot point to any such record after all they have said, and all the outcry they have made, the natural inference would be that the country does not care much for what they do say on such subjects. The people expect to hear it as a matter of course in order to produce a certain effect, and really let it pass as a sort of necessity: they must listen to it to a certain extent.

Mr. President, I was about to say that this bill, as it stands, is intended to meet a necessary or an inevitable result of the war—a war initiated by the South, carried on by them—a contest long, bitter, and exhausting. In the course of that war it became necessary to take measures to emancipate the slaves. Those measures were taken; they had their effect; and as a consequence, the Constitution has now been changed so that slavery no longer exists in this country. A large body of men, women, and children, millions in number, who had received no education, who had been laboring from generation to generation for their white owners and masters, able to own nothing, to accomplish nothing, are thrown, without protection, without aid, upon the charities of the world, in communities hostile to them, in communities which had been in the habit of looking upon them not only with derision but with all the feelings of contempt which it is possible one human being can indulge toward another; so far as their status was concerned and so far as they were concerned; and in communities, too, angered, outraged, if you please, by the fact that all these men had been freed from their domination. That was a necessity arising out of the contest. They were so freed, and found themselves and were found in that condition; and why? For the reason that we were compelled to avail ourselves of their services, in one particular, and in another for the reason that we were compelled to deprive their masters of the material aid which they furnished toward carrying on the contest against us; and thus we find them when arms have disappeared.

Now, will any man tell me that under such circumstances, a great people having availed themselves of that very fact, having used those former slaves, having deprived the enemy of all the aid which he received from them, will now throw them upon the world without the slightest protection, without the slightest aid, without any comfort, exposed to persecution and prosecution in every possible shape; and why? Because there is no provision in the Constitution whereby Congress is authorized to feed and clothe anybody. We have a written Constitution. In spite of all that the honorable Senator from Delaware has chosen to say, I think we have a respect for it. I think in all cases we have endeavored to adhere to it. There may have been some cases during the war where its provisions were violated, and perhaps necessarily violated. That comes as a matter inevitable in the course of all Governments in the many contingencies to which they are exposed, and under circumstances for which no previous provision could be made; but I would have gentlemen to reflect upon one thing, that as a part of the constitution, written or unwritten, of all Governments, stand the laws of nations necessarily, inevitably, from the relations which all communities bear to each other, and from the contingencies to which they are exposed. That being the case, and that unwritten law of nations being actually a part of our written law, we accept, as we must accept, all the consequences which follow from it.

We have been plunged into a war almost, if not quite, the greatest of modern times, involving vast results. Will gentlemen undertake to tell me that under such circumstances the necessary results of that war, if it brings about a state of things not found in our written Constitution, are to be avoided, shunned, not noticed in any possible way; that our affairs as connected with it are not to be closed up under the same law which governed us and govern all nations while the war continued? If so, what a miserable, weak, powerless people we are. We can carry on a great war, but the moment the clash of arms has ceased to strike our ears we become utterly powerless to provide for any of its necessary and inevitable results, because it is not written in the Constitution what we should do in a case which could not be foreseen, and which the founders of this Government purposely avoided foreseeing or speaking about! They provided on general principles for the emergency, but did not talk of it as a thing that could possibly occur. The Greeks would not mention in their laws the crime of parricide, because they would not suppose it was a crime that could ever be perpetrated.

We find ourselves in that condition, we, the Congress of the United States who have been carrying on this war—because after all, as part of the Government, we have carried it on—the gentlemen who sit opposite me, and who do not agree with me in my political views and sentiments, and with whom I do not agree, giving their aid to the same thing, I trust with a good heart and good spirit, I trust honestly and meaning all they appeared to do; and when they find us or find themselves and the Government in this condition necessarily as an inevitable and unavoidable result of the contest which they themselves have waged, the moment we begin to provide for what came out of it they tell us, "You are working against the Constitution; you cannot find anything there by which you can feed or clothe a man, woman, or child." That is the substance of what the honorable Senator from Delaware has told us to-day, and he finds particular offense in the fact that occasionally you see a skin a little darker than his own in the gallery. That is unconstitutional, too, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Sir, I accept no such doctrines. Whether you call it the war power or some other power, the power must necessarily exist, from the nature of the case, somewhere, and if anywhere, in us, to provide for what was one of the results of the contests in which we have been engaged. All the world would cry shame upon us if we did not. I know the gentlemen on the other side of the House, and personally I respect them; we are on the best terms in the world that men can be on who do not think alike; and I would trust the honorable Senator from Delaware himself if the case was put upon him to decide and he had to bear the responsibility of it before the world. He would not dare, no, he would not wish, to avoid it. Every sentiment of his heart and every manly emotion of his nature would revolt at any such idea. It only shows the difference between what a man would do himself and what for party purposes he can advise others to do.

I have thus stated the foundation of the bill. And what have we already done? At the last session of Congress we did what, although I was not a member of Congress at the time, met with my perfect approbation; we put it upon the War Department to take care of these people who had been a part of the war and an essential part of the war. We recognized it as connected with the military operations of the country, as it properly was. I did not approve at the time of the attempt to put it in any shape upon the Treasury Department; it did not belong there. It was connected with our military operations and could best be carried on as a part of them. Those operations having ceased in the field, we were not by that means delivered from what remained to be done in order to carry out to the full all that it was incumbent upon us to do in order to accomplish the purpose. We could not divest ourselves if we would of the responsibility that was upon us in reference to that matter, and we would not if we could; and again I will do the honorable Senators on the other side the justice to say that if the responsibility was on them they would not attempt any such thing for their own good name and for the good name and credit of their country.

It becomes necessary, in the judgment of the bureau that was then constituted, to make some amendments in the law and to extend its power. What is the outcry against it? It is said it is going to cost a great deal of money, and you tax the white people in order to meet this expense. This cry of taxation is all right enough. I do not complain of gentlemen for guarding the public Treasury carefully. I do not complain of my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] for looking out well for the public funds. I wish he and those who act with him would always be just as careful of the public lands which are part of the property of the country, and as sharp and as keen not to let an acre or an inch go except for some general purpose. I never heard of his objecting at any time to very liberal appropriations of the public lands for the benefit of the States in which they are situated. When I am talking about the property of the Republic, it does not make any very great difference to me whether it is land or money. Each is equally a part of the public property. What is in the Treasury, and what may come into it with proper management, are in my view equally valuable and equally to be regarded.

When gentlemen from any State which has been a confederate State undertake to tell me, "You are taxing the white man for the benefit of the negro," I will say, "Sir, you did this thing; had you not commenced this war and driven us to this necessity there would have been no taxation; you are responsible for it, not we; you have placed the necessity upon us; we have not placed it upon ourselves." And if there is any gentleman who encouraged the South in their previous action and held out to them even a sympathetic hand in the course they were pursuing—if there is any such person, here or elsewhere, I say to him, "You make this drain upon the Treasury, not we; you are the persons who are responsible for it—the South and their northern allies, if they had any such;" and I know they had some—none in this Chamber, but many able men out of it—who did sympathize with them and aid them all they could. I say to them, "When you talk about the great expense of this thing, tell them that you were the authors of it, and that your measures and your sympathies brought it upon the country, and that the dominant party in the Congress of the United States are simply trying to do the best they can with the result of your wickedness."

Now, sir, I will trust the Commissioner who stands at the head of this bureau for his own calculations. I will trust him because I know his ability and I know his integrity. He has examined this matter thoroughly and studied it well, and knows what he wishes to accomplish and knows what he ought to accomplish, and unless I see something upon the face of them that is in my judgment incorrect and wrong, I am willing to take his calculations as a general rule.

I listened with very great attention to the argument of the honorable Senator from Indiana. It was like all his arguments, directly to the point which he was discussing. He was attacking the bill. His argument was mainly confined to the question of expense. But, sir, is that really an argument? Ought not the thing to be done? That is the question. Will you make no appropriations for the benefit of these people; not only the colored people who have thus been thrown upon the world, but the refugees who have been driven by the war from their States, out of their possessions, and reduced to poverty and misery? I do not fear that if that question was put to the Senator from Indiana, and he compelled to answer it, he would say, "We must do it, and we have the power to do it." If he would not, I have totally misjudged him, I will not say in what particulars, but I formed altogether a very different opinion of him from what I would if he said we could do nothing. If we can do anything, if we can appropriate any money for the use of the War Department to meet a result of the war which was inevitable, where shall we draw the line of distinction? I was struck the other day by the argument with reference to the purchase of land; it staggered me somewhat, and I do not feel so perfectly clear upon it now; but Senators will reflect that when we look upon measures we are very apt to go back to previous days, when in a time of peace we guarded every approach to an expenditure for which we could not find a specific warrant.

Sir, we have now been taught that the Government possesses much larger and ampler powers than we had supposed. It was well at that day that such was the prevailing notion. It is well and it will be well if we revert to it as much as we possibly can; but if we attempt to hold that under an unexampled state of facts we cannot go beyond the rules that were laid down for our action in time of profound peace in reference to appropriations from the Treasury, we shall find ourselves utterly powerless to do what it is absolutely incumbent on us to do. So, then, the argument of money does not reach me, nor does the argument drawn from the constitutionality of the act. I might go further, and say that if everything else failed I might even perhaps agree with my friend, the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that under the second provision of the constitutional amendment, giving power to enforce the previous provision granting the freedom of the negro, we might do all that we judged essential in order to secure him in that liberty the enjoyment of which we have conferred upon him.

With regard, therefore, to all these details of objection to the bill—and I rose principally to say this—I see nothing which should trouble anybody arising from the considerations which have been advanced to us with reference to the constitutionality of the bill itself. We must meet it, and we must meet it under some power. There is no positive prohibition. It is a thing to be done. We have the power to appropriate money; and though we do not find a specific power to appropriate money for this particular purpose, it is yet an object of Government; a thing that the Government and country must provide for, and there is no other way of doing it. If we may appropriate money for this purpose, I ask the Senator to tell me what the distinction is between money and land; for, much as the objection originally struck me, I have been obliged to inquire why if I found the power to do the one I did not find the power to do the other. We may give away the public lands, but it does not follow from that power that we cannot purchase land. We may take the title and the power of Government over lands that are purchased for the mere purpose of carrying into execution certain specified powers. That has been decided. But because we may have specific permission in the Constitution to do that, it is a non sequitur that we have no power beyond it. To be sure, the lawyer's argument may be that from the fact of certain powers being specifically granted others are excluded; but we cannot argue thus in this case when we come to apply it to a state of facts that could not be contemplated before they arose.

I desired to say this much because I myself

stated a difficulty to the honorable Senator who is chairman of this committee the other day, and I have had some conversation with him on the subject since. I cannot work the problem out, and nobody else can, to show that in the Constitution itself there is a clear power; but I can work the problem out to show that the power may be found when the positive necessity of the thing is apparent, where the thing must be done, and must be done by the Government as a consequence of other things that it was compelled to do, and that it had a perfect right to do. Otherwise, as I have said before, we are a Government without the necessary powers to carry out and effect our own objects.

I am therefore willing to vote for a bill that has these provisions in it. I see no difficulty about them, except that which arises from objections that have been made by some gentlemen with reference to carrying this bureau into their States. That has been discussed and decided, and I do not propose for the mere purpose of talking to argue that question further. Everything has been stated on both sides of it, and the Senate has settled the point.

Now, sir, having said this generally with regard to the bill—and although in some of its details I might perhaps wish that we could get along without doing what might seem to be offensive in some States, and what might be used in an offensive sense against us, yet I am ready to vote for it, because it is the result of the best thought that a very able committee has brought to bear upon it, and it has been somewhat amended—I shall dismiss any further remarks upon the bill itself, because really to speak of that was but one of my objects in rising. I do not intend to avail myself of this occasion upon a bill of this description to say anything upon the subject of reconstruction. My position on the committee which has the condition of the late so-called confederate States in charge is such that I could not with propriety express any opinions upon what ought to be done. That will be known by the result of our deliberations, whatever that result may be. I have noticed, however, that gentlemen, perhaps on both sides of the House, were a little anxious to express their opinion beforehand and in advance of the report of the committee upon that subject; to discuss the question before they had the benefit, if it is to be a benefit, of the facts that we may be able to state and the conclusions to which we may finally come. That is a matter for every gentleman to judge of for himself, and it is not for me to complain of the result at which he may arrive in his own mind as governing his own action; but there is one thing upon which I do wish to say a word or two.

Senators, and able Senators, on both sides of the House have chosen, in the course of the debate, to talk a great deal about the policy of the President and the policy of Congress. I said a word or two before on that subject at the commencement of the session, when the matter was first broached here. I wish now to say a word or two more. I can understand why gentlemen on the other side of the House, and gentlemen of the same way of thinking out of this House, should be very anxious to get up the idea that there is a collision of opinion between the President and Congress. We have all sorts of rumors where "the wish is father to the thought." One day we hear that such a Cabinet minister is to be turned out or resign; another day we hear that something else is being done, that the President has said this, that the President means to ostracize people who do not support his policy, &c.—all idle, ridiculous rumors, without the slightest foundation except the wish of those who invent them and give them currency. I understand the object. It will be a point for gentlemen on the other side of the Senate, and their friends outside, if they can make the people believe that there is or is likely to be some collision between the great party which elected the President and the President himself. I beg gentlemen not to flatter themselves with any such idea. I have not, as yet, seen the slightest indication of it, and I do not expect to see it. Why, sir, even suppose there is a difference of opinion, to a certain extent, as to the time and manner of accomplishing a great work, which we all desire to see accomplished at the earliest possible day, does it follow that because there is that difference of opinion, to a certain extent, greater or less, therefore there is to be a collision? I know very well that gentlemen hang about the President and the White House, and very probably try to persuade him, and, whispering in his ear, (the Senate will remember the poetic illustration of the serpent tempter, "squat like a toad at the ear of Eve,") insinuate that those who ought to be his best friends, and who are his friends and supporters, are not doing all they ought to do to sustain him. Do they in their secret souls pay the President the poor compliment to think that he does not see through all those suggestions of what they dare not openly speak? Do they think he is not a man of sense, that he is not a man of fixed opinions, that he does not know his friends? Let me say that, in my judgment, they mistake him. Sir, there is no collision; and I say it—be my word worth much or little—for the benefit of the country, to add my word to that statement of fact. Why? Because the President has done nothing that his friends complain of, and his friends in Congress have done nothing that he can complain of.

Sir, what was his authority? He was Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and as such, when the enemy ceased to exist, he had power necessarily to control the rebellious States which were thus reduced to subjection. It was his duty to control them, and to control them as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, having the military power in his hands, to keep order, to see that there was no anarchy; and if he chose to say to the confederate States, or to any portion of them, "I will appoint a provisional governor for you; if you choose to come together in a certain way and make a constitution of government for yourselves and take the power into your own hands of regulating your own domestic internal affairs, I will give you all the aid I can, and when you do it to my satisfaction and I think it is safe I will then withdraw the Army, or such portion of it as I see fit, and leave you to legislate for yourselves," he did what he had a perfect right to do and what nobody has a right to complain of. I might have done differently if I had been President, but I might probably not have done so wisely as he did. It is not for me to say that my opinion, had it differed from his, would have been wiser than his or better than his; but what I mean to say is that his policy went to that extent, and so far as he had the power to exercise it in a given way he exercised it rightfully, and we have no occasion to complain of it. He may think that these States are ready to come back altogether, and to send their Senators and Representatives to Congress. I do not know how that may be. I think they should come in at the earliest possible moment that they can come with safety. So he thinks. We may differ as to the time.

But mark me, sir, no man in this country, to my certain knowledge, has a greater respect for the Constitution or a more profound respect for the rights and privileges of the coordinate branches of this Government than the President of the United States. His life has illustrated it; and whatever gentlemen may think, he, in my judgment, would be the last man to complain of Congress for acting with reference to what is peculiarly incumbent upon them according to their own judgment and sense of propriety, so long as all the branches of the Government agree in this, that when it can be done safely, at the earliest possible moment, all the States should be restored to their position in the Union. So long as that is agreed upon, and we are all working together to that end, it is not to be expected that my friends here, there, or elsewhere, will quarrel with me for differing with him in opinion as to the time and as to the manner in doing it, and more especially shall I not think of quarreling with him when it belongs to him to decide, and not to me.

Now, sir, all this talk about the President's policy—whether it comes from the other side of the House, from which it may properly come and be heard, or whether it comes from our side of the House, from which, in my most respectful judgment, it cannot so properly come, in the present state of things—amounts to nothing at all. I have thought that all the danger there was in this country arising from any source would come from extremes. Some men cannot get things just exactly according to their ideas and exactly in their own time, and other men want to be considered as knowing more about affairs than anybody else; and they stand as somebody—I think it was my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON]—said yesterday, as a sort of scatteration party that really do not affect the great issue one way or the other. Here are Congress, doing what? What they ought to do, what no man can dispute their perfect right to do, what no man can dispute their entire duty to do; and that is this: before taking a step which is perhaps to affect the welfare of this Government in all future time, and in acting upon a question that belongs peculiarly to them, the united wisdom of the nation as manifested through its agents in Congress deems it a duty to deliberate quietly, calmly, and patiently upon what it is best to do. Do you think anybody will quarrel with that? We do not mean to jump at conclusions; we mean to act as fast as we can safely; but we do not mean to be hurried beyond what our judgment dictates as the necessary time for deliberation and for action. The nation will, however, understand, and does understand, that while Congress is doing this, it is anxious, as the people are anxious, that all these questions should be settled at the earliest possible day, that we may get rid of all this agitation, that we may be again a united people, with all the stars in the flag, which my honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] says are there, and having a right to shine one with as much luster as another; and so far as I am concerned—and I believe that to be the general feeling of the friends with whom I act—I seek not to impose nor shall I try to impose any conditions upon any people in this Union who are to make a part of us that either now or at any future time shall have anything in them of the character of degradation.

It is not to be supposed, it cannot possibly be supposed for a moment, that the people of the confederate States who have been at war with us feel kindly toward us. I should not at once feel kindly toward any enemy who had conquered me, and through whom I had suffered, even if I was wrong. Such is human nature. Time is necessary to soften all animosities. Time is necessary to overcome prejudice. Time is necessary to make people reflect calmly upon what has taken place. They cannot do it in the heat of the contest or until they have had time to cool. It is, therefore, to be expected that much will occur, and for a considerable period of time, that will occasion still greater animosity perhaps, that will indicate a state of feeling that may render a perfect reunion apparently impossible; but I trust in God that the time will come and is not far distant when all the States may be properly represented here. I agree fully with the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GUTHRIE] who addressed the Senate the other day, in saying that I should be as much averse as he is to doing anything which by any possibility should be construed into putting a stigma upon any people who are to become members of this community of States, if they are not now.

But, while I say this, I say that I trust our friends here will not allow themselves to be hurried or to be frightened by any talk about this policy or that policy, or this collision or that trouble anywhere. I do not fear it. I believe, and I know, that there is patriotism and magnanimity and love of country at both ends of the avenue, and I do not believe that anything that can be said by anybody who is disposed to make a difficulty will occasion one with men constituted as we are. I warn gentlemen now that all the efforts they make in that direction will, in my judgment, prove total failures, and they will find themselves reckoning without their host.

Mr. President, I have said perhaps more than I ought to say on that subject; but I desire to enter my protest against this kind of discussion, taking it for granted, as gentlemen seem to do, that there was a difficulty, when they could not tell where and about a subject they did not know what. Either they do not understand it or they purposely misrepresent it. I believe we should go on, pass this measure and the series of measures that we have decided upon, and carry them into execution. Gentlemen will make an outcry about their unconstitutionality; they will threaten us with the growth of the Democratic party, and what is to come after. We will try to possess our souls in patience, and wait until the calamity comes, and, when it does, meet it with the best grace we can.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, I rise to reply to a single observation which caught my ear as the Senator from Maine was about taking his seat, and I make this reply because I desire it to be marked and understood. There are a great many evil things in this country, and those evil things have been culminating upon us for a long time, and the culmination almost, not quite, has been expressed in the last remark of the Senator from Maine, when he says, "We have settled these things; we have determined that we will do thus." Who are "we?" The Senate of the United States? The councilors who come here to take care of and counsel about the great affairs of this Republic? The persons with whom are charged our great necessities? Are they the "we?" No, not we, but us, the men who withdraw themselves from the Senate of the United States and make themselves a clique, a partisan crowd, who go down into caucus and there settle what is to be done in the Federal Senate of the United States. Observe that "we" does not cover all of the Senate. The Senator says, "We have settled these things, and therefore they shall be done." Wicked or worse words never were said in any high council hall in the world, and they never should be said in this council hall. It is within very recent years, and within the time of the ascendancy of the party of whom the Senator is one, that men in caucus spoke to the Federal Senate and did not speak in council hall. I have a right by my commission which accredits me to this body to speak in this Chamber as well as any man on this floor; but I have no voice here, and I have been without a voice for years, because I have not happened to coincide with all the notions of those who now form the majority.

The Senator from Maine arises here, and with his stern voice and his semi-omnipotent power says, "We say thus." Who are "we?" Are "we" a partisan crowd in the Senate Chamber organized for partisan efforts, or are "we" councilors of the nation?

Unhappily, Mr. President, for this nation, the Senator speaks for partisan councilors in this Hall, and not for the great nation, not after consulting with all the Senate, but seeking a crowd who may possess a majority, that can make a rule and compel results. These things were not known in the former days of our Republic, and as far as my memory runs they were not known in the days when the party to which I belong were said to be in the ascendant. Antagonist as we were to the party in opposition to us, we yet met them in council, and as we differed we voted, and the result followed, not by any rule made in an ante-chamber, but by the best judgment of the gentlemen who sat on the Senate floor. That high office that was then filled by Senators of the United States has been degraded, and the Senator from Maine is boasting of it; that, calling his clansmen to his heels, he with his retainers can achieve a triumph against all argument, against all reason, against the best judgment of men here on the floor.

I say this is one of the worst signs of the Republic. I do not speak ignorantly. This was the uniform evil that affected republics in ancient times. The power of a majority used tyrannically is the worst tyranny in the world. So it has been affirmed; so all history teaches. A disposition has been affirmed of the majority here to exhibit their power and boast of it, and say, "We are the Senate; you who sit on the other side of the Chamber are nobody; we have the power and God has enlightened us," as some of them say; but the Senator from Maine does not say that. They have the power to accomplish results, and therefore things are to be done, and the question is not whether it is right or wrong, but "we," the majority, "have the power and we will maintain it." It happened a long time ago that a man who had a desperate purpose in his head said, expressing his wrath:

"Like to the Pontic sea,
Whose icy current and compulsive course
Ne'er feels retiring ebb, but keeps due on To the Propontic and the Hellespont;
Even so, my bloody thoughts, with violent pace,
Shall ne'er look back ne'er ebb to humble love,
Till that a capable and wide revenge
Swallow them up."

That is the expression of the power of majority. They may remember that that old Moor of Venice, when he had expressed his triumph in action and had achieved all that his wrath commanded, fell down and placed the dagger to his own bosom. I say to gentlemen who command the majority now and who do it with a wrathful force, that they may find the time when they will be very much like the Moor of Venice, who, not during the exercise of his force but afterward, came to the consciousness of the great wrong that he had committed.

Now I, as northern a man as any one on this floor, say to gentlemen that it is well to consider whether there may not be others than the Senator from Maine and other Senators from the New England States that belong to this Union. My own impression is that as true men belong to this Confederacy in every part of the Union as belong to any part of the New England States. I think that as good men belong to my own State. I think that on a former occasion I stated—I beg pardon now for repeating it—that when the Union was in trouble, I first affirmed on my coast that it had to be maintained. On that occasion I was the first who dared to affirm that it should be maintained, and I did it in the presence of pistols and knives; I was then considered a very good Union man, but in these modern times, in the times of which we are presently speaking, I am not considered a very good Union man. My colleague from California who followed me on that occasion remembers the incident to which I have alluded, and he remembers that I made the first Union speech made on our coast, and it was at a time when almost everybody who was called to speak failed.

Now, it is not worth while for New England or for the middle States, or for the northern States to engage in these discussions. For myself, I say that these discussions anger me, because wise men, just men, true men, ought to drop all such considerations and come to the just appreciation of the condition in which we are. I differ with Senators about many matters of detail, but probably not so much in regard to conclusions. I think we ought to go to work and vote on proper measures of legislation and arrive at just conclusions. I happen to be one of those who do not believe that New England knows as much about the South as I do myself, living between South and North, if you please, and I shall exercise my own judgment. Let us go to work and do our business, settle this pending question and settle other questions that are before us, without much further discussion. I believe I have not troubled the Senate much, and shall do so no more now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I did not intend to say another word on the bill now before the Senate, but as the Senator from Maine made quite a direct allusion to a portion of the argument which I felt it to be my duty to present, I will very briefly reply.

I do not, in the first place, intend to reply at any length to that portion of his speech which was political. Of course he knows that he differs from the minority here upon the question upon which he has expressed an opinion, and that was, that the Democratic party was responsible for the late war. My views are simply these: this was a Government, a confederation of equal States, each State secure, under the Constitution, in the control of its domestic affairs. Its domestic institutions were not at all to be controlled by the Federal Government. In respect to one of the institutions of a portion of the States, there was a constitutional guarantee of its protection, and all the States were pledged in good faith to stand by that guarantee as by every other provision of the Constitution. I thought that any disregard of the obligations of the Constitution, any attack upon the provisions of the Constitution, any refusal to obey any portion of the Constitution, was revolutionary in its character and tended to disruption, and I did think, for a number of years, some of the States in the North, and many of the people of the North, under the sentiment that there was a higher law than the Constitution, had refused that sort of respect to a portion of the Constitution which was necessary for the peace and quiet of the country. On the other hand, I think that there were men in the southern States, known as fire-eaters, disturbers of the peace, that took advantage of what was a partial sentiment of the North, to excite a very violent prejudice on the part of the people of the South toward the people of the North. I then believed, and I yet believe, that it was the agitation by a portion of the men of the North and the agitation by a portion of the men of the South that got the people of the North and the people of the South to hate each other, and thence came war. That was my opinion then, and that is my opinion now.

I do not admit the force of the Senator's argument that in the South the Democratic party was particularly strong, and because the revolution broke out in the South, therefore the Democratic party, as a party, are responsible for it. When the men of the South went off into revolution they separated their connection with the Democracy of the North. Then the Democracy of the North stood alone upon its fealty and its allegiance to the Constitution of the Union. Sir, is it fair to say that because a portion of the Democratic party was found in the South, and that a portion of those men were guilty of wrong, therefore it attaches to the whole party? Does the Senator ignore that mighty party at the North? Is he not aware of the fact that Indiana and Illinois almost continuously were Democratic States? Does he ignore the fact that in the great empire State of Ohio the Democratic party for half the time had maintained an ascendancy? Does he dispute the fact that in the great State of Pennsylvania the Democratic party for many years controlled its affairs? Does he not know that in the Empire State of New York the Democratic party prior to and up to the present time has been and is a mighty power? Then, sir, strong here, strong in the North alone, giving the great vote that the Senator from Kentucky referred to yesterday, a mighty party within the northern States alone, it did not cease to be a party because the southern Democracy went off from it and went into revolution. If the Senator can satisfy himself that to deny constitutional obligation, and to set up above that the conscience of the citizen against the Constitution to agitate those questions which the Constitution has settled, is not revolutionary in its tendencies, that it does not tend to disrupt and break up the Union, then the Senator can satisfy himself that his portion of the people are not at all responsible.

Nor, sir, do I undertake to discuss the further question which he understands very much better than I do, who has a special right to the confidence of the President of the United States. I did not help to elect him, the Senator did. I hope the President will confine his patronage to the men who helped to elect him. That is my feeling upon that subject, and if that is at all a disturbing question with the Senator, I hope that he will not in future be disturbed by it.

The Senator says, not addressing us particularly, but as a sort of friendly lecture to his own party—and therefore I am not required to answer it at length—that there is no danger of disruption in his own party, that men may make themselves perfectly easy on that subject. I have not been disturbed upon that question, and I have not heard of any Democrat saying he was disturbed about it. Who has been disturbed? It must be on his own side, it is not here; none of us have said a word about it. The Senator from Wisconsin the other day alluded to it, and he seemed to be afraid that somebody was going to take the President away from him. I hope he will be entirely satisfied by the assurance given to him this morning by the Senator from Maine.

Sir, if the Republican party was a little different party from that which it is, I should think there might be some danger of disorganization. I know the fact, because I have heard it here in debate, that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DIXON] do not agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.] I have seen their animated and angry debates here upon questions of policy. I know, because I have observed it in debate, that there is this difference of opinion among the gentlemen of the majority; but perhaps the Senator from Maine is right in saying that no differences of principle, no differences upon questions of policy are dangerous to the organization of the Republican party. There was said to be a stronger bond than principle and policy, and that was "the cohesive power of public plunder." It may be that the Senator from Maine has more confidence in the power that may possess over the union of his party than the cohesive power of principle. He understands this question better than I do.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to my friend that his experience of the strength of that principle has probably taught him to have great confidence in it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I concede to the Senator from Maine that my observation is that public plunder is a very powerful bond of union; but I had not in the Democratic party found it to possess the power that the Senator himself seems to think it possesses in his own party. We know there is a difference of opinion, we know that a very prominent and powerful Senator of the majority denounced a message of the President of the United States as "white-washing" in its character. We know that the Senator from Ohio dissented in very bitter terms the other day from the policy of the President, and especially in reference to his pardoning of rebels. We know, because we hear it in the Senate, that there are these differences. But perhaps the Senator from Maine is right when he admonishes his friends that there is no danger, that the President is not going to fall off from them. That is not a question that I choose further to debate; it is a question of a domestic sort belonging to the party in power.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We will take care of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I dare say it will be taken care of, as I suggested. I wish to say but a very few words now upon the bill.

The Senator asked a very forcible and pointed question: whether if the responsibility were upon the minority of this body, we would pass a bill like this. I believe he used the very strong expression, would we dare to do it. Mr. President, individually I would dare to do whatever my duty required; but there is one thing I would not dare to do. Whatever seemed to be the responsibility upon me or my party, I would not dare to violate the Constitution in order to pass any law. I cannot dare to do that. That is not courage, it is crime. I did not think this bill was allowed by the Constitution of the United States, and therefore I opposed it, and in a very plain sort of argument I attempted to give my views upon it. I wish now to ask the Senator just as direct a question. Suppose the negro population of the United States were separated entirely from the white population, and he were required to form a constitution of government for them as a political community standing alone, would he dare to pass for them a law or constitution so vague and uncertain in its terms as this bill proposes?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not a supposable case.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not a supposable case! I know that the Governor of Ohio, one of the most eloquent writers of the Republican party, in the campaign in his letters to his constituents, said that he advocated the colonization to some States of the Union of the colored people, and their entire separation from the white people.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have always looked upon that proposition as an absurdity upon its face. I will say to the Senator that I could never imagine how a sensible man could entertain it; but it seems sensible men do.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My distinguished friend from Kansas, [Mr. LANE,] at the last session, or the session before, introduced a proposition here in the Senate to separate the races. He brought a measure before the body to send the colored people to western Texas. Then, if it is supported by so distinguished and able a Senator as the Senator from Kansas, and if it was the battle-cry of the Republican party in Ohio at the last election, and the election resulted in the success of General Cox, how can the Senator say that it is an absurdity? But I wish to ask the question again, would the Senate, for any political community separated to itself, enact such a constitution as this would be? In the first place, they have no selection of the officers. Men are appointed that they know nothing of, without any restrictions upon their power.

The bill that is before the body is entitled "A bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau." Will any Senator be good enough to tell the body what are the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau? I have read the law of last session; I have read this proposed amendment; and I am entirely unable to say what are the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau. I did, to some extent, understand the powers proposed to be given in the bill advocated by the Senator from Massachusetts at the last session, for it undertook to define the powers; but here is the definition that is given in the law of last winter; here is the definition of power and the only restriction, so far as I know:

"That there is hereby established in the War Department, to continue during the present war of rebellion and for one year thereafter, a Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, to which shall be committed, as hereinafter provided, the supervision and management of all abandoned lands, and the control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from rebel States."

The management of the lands and the control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen are the matters committed to it. What definition is that of the power of a government within a Government, organized and endowed with power by general words to take care of all subjects relating to four million people? Does that extend to the contracts these people may make? Does that extend to their personal rights or privileges? Does that extend to wrongs committed upon their person and their property? Does that extend to the power of fixing their status in the community to which they are bound? What is the power that is given to this Freedmen's Bureau? I think I may safely say that no Senator can define it, and the effect of this sort of legislation is seen in General Grant's report. He says that in many localities this bureau has been badly managed, some agents holding one doctrine and managing its affairs upon one principle, other agents acting upon other principles and upon other powers.

Now, sir, I submit the question to any Senator, would you pass such a law as this as a constitution for a separate political community? If you would not, if you would say that no Government ought to be recognized anywhere or for any people with such a vague and uncertain definition of its powers, is the objection not yet stronger when it is to regulate the affairs of four million people mingling and living among the white people, especially as the action of this bureau is not to affect alone the colored people, but it is to affect the white people so far as they have intercourse with the colored people? I could not vote for any bill at the last session or at the present session which conferred in such a general way the power to control the affairs of a race of people.

One other point is made by the Senator from Maine. He says that he knows no difference between the management of the public lands and the management of the money belonging to the Government, and he says that he has never observed that I have been very careful about the appropriation of public lands for western enterprises. I am very free to say to the Senator that my opinions are very liberal in regard to the use of the public domain in the western States, for several reasons.

In the first place, the Constitution of the United States in express terms gives to Congress the full control and disposition of the public lands. The power is conferred clearly and plainly, and it is a question of discretion and judgment on the part of Congress as to the manner of the disposition of the public lands. Congress owns immense tracts of lands on the border settlements. To develop its own lands and encourage the people in their purchase, it appropriates a portion of them to public works, to the construction of military roads and railroads. This I say Congress may well do in the exercise of its discretion, because it is a wise use of the public lands. An individual would so use his own lands. If the Senator from Maine were the owner of a large tract of land in the State of Minnesota, and it was proposed to construct a railroad in the neighborhood of the land, I know that, as a prudent manager of his own affairs, he would subscribe a portion of that land to the construction of that important work, so that the remaining lands would be worth more to him. That is the policy of the Government, and the Government has never sustained a loss by it. The State of Indiana received some of the public lands as a gift or donation, but out of the people of the State of Indiana, the Government of the United States, in the sales of the public lands, deducting the grants to the State, made a clear profit of nearly fifteen million dollars. The agriculture of Indiana paid that enormous profit to the General Government in the acquisition of homesteads for her people. The people of Maine had their lands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me ask the Senator a question. Has he not uniformly supported appropriations for the benefit of agriculture?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator refers to the grant of lands for the support of agricultural colleges—

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; I refer to appropriations for the Agricultural Bureau; the purchase of seeds and all those things?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No doubt of it. When I voted for the general appropriation bill I suppose I voted for that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Where does the Senator find authority in the Constitution to make these appropriations?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not exactly finding authority for that now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator represents the Finance Committee in this body, and when he reports a bill he had better find the authority himself. If I voted wrong upon a question of that sort it is no argument that I was wrong in voting appropriations of the public lands, and that is the question between the Senator and myself.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is true; but I referred to a previous remark of the Senator, that there was no authority for this appropriation. I ask him where he finds authority for the other.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When that bill comes up I propose, if the subject is of sufficient importance, to discuss it. I do not choose now, for the purpose of illustrating the principle I am discussing, to go off upon another question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The question which the Senator asked of me was whether I could vote to grant the public lands to enterprises in the West and at the same time refuse to vote money to support the indigent in the States. That is the question that he propounded. I have undertaken to show the difference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken; I propounded no such question; I commented a little upon his course good-naturedly, for the purpose of illustrating my own idea, that so far as taking care of the public property is concerned, I do not know but that we are bound to take equal care of the lands as of the money.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir, I agree with the Senator on that proposition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was the extent of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I agree that we must exercise a wise discretion in the execution of the power which the Constitution confers upon us over the public lands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will not understand me as quarreling with his course.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not believe Congress ought to give the public lands away unless some public interest is to be gained by it, some work of general importance in which the nation's interest is promoted, or encouragement is given to the settlement of the lands, in which all the people are interested. That is the sum and substance of my views upon that question.

But, sir, the question recurs; where is the power on the part of the General Government to take certain white people and certain colored people under the especial charge of the United States and to support them at the public expense? That is the question, and the Senator refers to the circumstances of the case and to international law as an answer. We are now in a time of peace. It is no use for the Senator to pretend that this is a time of war, because it is not. Everybody knows that it is not a time of war. We may theorize upon that subject as much as we please, but we all know the war is over; the southern armies are disbanded, and the most of our troops have returned to their homes; the country is in a state of peace; and civil governments have been established in most of the States. The question is simply, where do we derive the power to appropriate money out of the public Treasury for the support of indigent persons in the States? If we can carry that proposition, then this Government can assume to do anything that it may choose to do. I recollect that when I was a member of the House of Representatives, there was a bill proposed granting public lands to the States for the support of the indigent, insane, and the blind in the States. It was a proposition that appealed very strongly to my sympathies; it was a proposition to appropriate public lands; yet I voted against it, because I did not think the object contemplated was within the constitutional powers of the General Government. It might have been, according to the letter of the Constitution, constitutional to grant the lands, because we had the power to dispose of them; but it was not within the provisions of the Constitution to support the indigent, insane, and blind in the States; that was a duty according to our form of government that devolved upon the States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As much stress is laid by the Senator from Indiana upon his assumption that the Government of the United States has no right to appropriate money to take care of indigent persons, as he says, and as he seems to regard this as an act of the first impression, without going over the argument again I wish to call his attention to two statutes of the United States passed many years ago. Then I should like to know what the difference in principle is between the cases to which I shall refer and the one under consideration. I read from the twenty-seventh section of the act in regard to the slave trade, passed in 1819:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to make such regulations and arrangements as he may deem expedient for the safe-keeping, support, and removal beyond the limits of the United States of all such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color as may be so delivered and brought within their jurisdiction"—

This refers to Africans or persons of color who are brought within the jurisdiction of the United States for the purpose of reducing them to slavery—

"and to appoint a proper person or persons, residing upon the coast of Africa, as agent or agents for receiving the negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color delivered from on board vessels seized in the prosecution of the slave trade by the commanders of the United States armed vessels."

There was an act passed over forty years ago authorizing the President of the United States to appoint an agent to take charge of these very colored people that we are proposing to take charge of now through the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau. They are now cast upon the Government by the war. In the instances provided for under the act prohibiting the slave trade, they were negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color thrown upon the charity of the Government when they were taken out of the possession of those who were seeking to reduce them to slavery, or were by stress of weather driven on our coast. Do they occupy any different relation to the Government when, as the result of the war, they are thrown destitute and helpless upon the Government, than they would if, as a consequence of the slave trade or an attempt to carry on the slave trade, they were thrown helpless and destitute upon our shores?

Again, sir, in 1860, before this rebellion broke out, on the 16th of June, the year before the rebellion, it was provided by an act of Congress—

"That it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States to enter into contract with any person or persons, society or societies, or body corporate, for a term not exceeding five years, to receive from the United States through their duly constituted agent or agents, upon the coast of Africa, all negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, delivered from on board vessels seized in the prosecution of the slave trade, by commanders of the United States armed vessels, and to provide the said negroes, mulattoes, and persons of color with comfortable clothing, shelter, and provisions for a period not exceeding one year from the date of their being landed on the coast of Africa, at a price in no case to exceed $100 for each person so clothed, sheltered, and provided with food: Provided, That any contract so made as aforesaid may be renewed by the President from time to time as found necessary for periods not to exceed five years on each renewal."

It would seem as if this Freedmen's Bureau act must have been copied in part from this law. The Congress of the United States vested the President of the United States with authority before the war to provide food, shelter, and clothing for Africans taken from this country to the coast of Africa, to feed them there for five years, and provided for the appointment of agents forty years ago to take charge of such persons. Now, I should like to know if it was competent for Congress to do that, (and I believe that power was never doubted,) why it may not do it in this case? Why is not the exigency just as great?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand the Senator to propose a question. Without entering into the argument upon the subject my reply is simply this: the Constitution of the United States provided that Congress should not prohibit the slave trade prior to the year 1808. It was doubted whether that was a mere prohibition, or whether it also involved the power after that time to prohibit it. The latter construction finally obtained, and under that power after the year 1808 Congress enacted the law to which the Senator has referred. In the exercise of its power to prohibit the slave trade, savages were brought to our shores, and under the provisions of the law they were taken captive. They were not citizens; they were not provided for as citizens; but Congress provided for those who fell under the control and into the custody of the Government in the execution of the laws prohibiting and preventing the slave trade.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Exactly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will add, also, that they were not citizens of the United States, not made free here to remain among us, but to be carried back under the provisions of the law to prevent that trade.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I suppose we could provide for strangers and not for our own. I believe the good Book says that he is worse than an infidel who will not do that. Now the Senator tells us that under the Constitution which gave Congress power to prohibit the slave trade this act was passed, and if as a result of the prohibition of the slave trade there were cast upon our shores these savages who were not citizens, they not being citizens we had a right to feed and clothe them in pursuance of an act of Congress passed in accordance with the Constitution. Does the Senator not recognize the power in the Constitution to put down this rebellion? Does he not recognize the fact that under the exercise of a constitutional power the rebellion has been crushed? Does he not recognize the fact that under the authority of the Constitution slavery has been abolished, and these people cast upon us?

But he says the savages from Africa were not citizens. Well, I am glad to have the Senator from Indiana admit that the negro is a citizen. Some persons with whom he has been politically associated have not been willing to admit that fact. But I cannot conceive how the Constitution gives us the authority to feed and clothe and to take care of human beings who are not citizens, for five years on the coast of Africa, who do not belong to us at all, and gives us no power to feed and clothe and provide for those who are among us. As a question of power, it seems to me that if we can do the one we can certainly do the other.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator before he takes his seat whether in his opinion Congress had the power to enact that law, except for the power to prohibit and prevent the slave trade. Where does he find the power if not there?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I endeavored to show in some remarks which I submitted the other day where I thought the power was to be derived from, and I do not propose to argue that question over again. My object in rising to-day was to show to the Senator, who seemed in his argument to assume that here was the exercise of some new power, that the Congress of the United States for forty years had exercised the very power that is proposed to be exercised by this bill, to feed, clothe, and take care of indigent persons who were thrown upon us as a nation, and that in our capacity as a nation we had taken care of such persons. If we had the right to do it in regard to savages, not citizens, who were cast upon us, in pursuance of law, just as these people are now rightfully in our control, we have as good a right to provide for them. I wanted to show there was a precedent for it; I do not propose now to go over the argument again to show whence the authority is derived.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator has misapprehended the question which I have asked him. He has referred to the enactment of Congress forty years ago. If the power is not found in the provision of the Constitution to prohibit and prevent the slave trade, for the enactment of that law, where is the power found? He has referred to a law. I know he does not claim that this bureau may be organized under the power of the Government to prohibit the slave trade. He has not claimed that. Now, I ask him if it were not for the power to prohibit the slave trade, from what provision of the Constitution did Congress derive the power to carry these people back where he speaks of and provide for them in Africa?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Indiana proposes to me a question. If the Senator would allow me I would merely repeat, however, what I said before. The Senator asked the same question before. The power under the Constitution to feed and clothe persons in Africa, I suppose, grows out of the authority to suppress the slave trade and to take care of those persons who are thrown upon us in violation of that law to suppress the slave trade. But if there were no law to suppress the slave trade, and if savages by stress of weather, if Feejee Islanders or anybody else, were cast upon the shores of this country and came in the possession of the authorities of the nation, and must perish but for its protection and care, I insist that as one of the nations of the earth, as an independent Power, clothed with the attributes of sovereignty, it would be our duty, our duty by the law of nations as well as the obligations imposed upon us by humanity, to take care of them temporarily and provide for them lest they should suffer and die for the want of care and protection. But, sir, I insist in this case that the persons we intend providing for under this Freedmen's Bureau are, in pursuance of law, in our control just as much and as completely as the Africans whom it was sought to reduce to slavery in defiance of the law prohibiting the slave trade were in our control when they came upon our coast.

Mr. DAVIS. I have some amendments to move, and I propose to do it now, but I will remark en passant, Mr. President, that the most latitudinous principle in the construction of the powers of this Government that I have ever heard announced has been this moment announced by the Senator from Illinois. There is no analogy whatever between the freed negroes here and the negroes who were captured in the suppression of the slave trade. The extent to which the legislation of Congress has gone in relation to negroes that were taken in the suppression of the slave trade is this: where our cruisers in their operations to suppress that trade captured slavers upon the coast of Africa, or where those slavers attempted to introduce slaves into the United States against our laws declaring the slave trade piracy, for the purpose of preventing the starvation and the perishing of these slaves, as an office of humanity, Congress passed laws appropriating money to supply the wants of those wretched beings; and these precedents the Senator from Illinois gravely relies upon as authority for the passage of this bill!

Now, Mr. President, the freed negroes in the State of Kentucky constitute a portion of our population; the freed negroes in South Carolina and in all the southern States constitute a portion of their population. It is a principle of our system of government, and the Senator from Illinois cannot overturn or shake it, that every State is bound to provide for its own paupers, whether they be black or white, whether those paupers have been slaves liberated and emancipated under the laws of the States before the rebellion, or whether they have been manumitted by the operation of the amendment to the Constitution. There is no distinction of principle between those classes of paupers, and the obligation of each State to provide for its paupers is precisely the same in relation to the one class as the other; it is precisely the same in relation to all the classes. Do I understand the Senator from Illinois to contend for the power of the General Government to provide for all these pauper negroes in the late slave States? The people of Kentucky would be gratified if the Congress of the United States could constitutionally take off them this burden; but it is a burden that belongs to them, and one which neither the Government of the United States nor the Congress of the United States has any right or power whatever to assume. If there is an obligation or a duty or a power to take care of the negro paupers, there is, I suppose, an equal obligation to take care of the white paupers of the different States. I repudiate that principle as wholly heretical and as not having a figment of authority in the Constitution; and the attempt to draw a parallel between the case of the African negroes who were captured on slave ships or who were brought into the United States against the express provisions of our law for the suppression of the slave trade and the free negro paupers of the different States, is an utter failure; they are no more alike than the mastodon and the whale.

But, Mr. President, I rose for a different purpose. I know that this bill is to pass, and I know that no obstacle which one as inconsiderable as myself can throw, or attempt to throw, in the way of its passage will impede it for a moment. It is to pass upon the old principle, not of constitutional law, but the old principle of human nature, where there is a will there is a way. The majority in this Senate have the will, and they intend to devise the way, regardless of the Constitution. I was amused at the earnestness, and instructed and gratified by the power of the appeal made by my friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] to Senators here to observe and respect the Constitution and the oaths which they had taken to support it. My honorable friend must know—we all know—that in this Chamber, in the nation, in universal humanity, in high party times, there is a higher obligation than the oath to support the Constitution, or the provisions and principles of that Constitution, and that higher obligation, to which all others yield, is the good of party. To preserve and save party, when that comes into competition with the Constitution and constitutional obligation, that obligation and that Constitution are given to the winds of heaven.

The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] in his speech introduces another principle upon which this bill is to be passed, and that is the principle of necessity. I do not concede as a principle of our Government the principle of necessity to override the Constitution or the law in any possible case either in war or peace; but I admit that the Supreme Court of the United States have sustained the principle of necessity thus far, and no further—and in obedience to the authority of that court I subscribe to it to that extent—that, in time of war, when an army in the field is in an extreme exigence, and that exigence is so immediate and so impending that there is not time to resort to the forms of law, that army may take for itself the necessary military supplies, under the law of necessity; but at the same time the Supreme Court, in the case of Harmony vs. Mitchell, and the Court of Claims, in the opinion rendered by Justice Wilnot two years ago, concede explicitly that even that necessity requires the Government to pay for the property that is taken. Mr. President, has it come to this, that the powers of this Government are to be enlarged and expanded upon the principle of necessity? My understanding is that there is no power vested in the Government of the United States that is not derived from the Constitution; and I understand that the Supreme Court has sustained that principle in scores of cases. And yet we are told that this limited Government, created by a Constitution which especially provides that every power not therein delegated to the General Government is reserved to the people or to the States respectively, may expand and multiply its powers upon the principle of necessity. What necessity? The necessity of the nation? The necessity of preserving the Constitution? The necessity of maintaining popular liberty? Oh, no; the necessity is that the fortunes of the Republican party are imperiled; that it is in danger of losing office and place; that the whole power of the Government and its patronage is about to slip from their hands; and this produces a necessity that creates a law that hereby authorizes Congress to pass the measure under consideration.

Mr. President, I have always understood heretofore that in this country this odious principle of necessity, the tyrant's plea, the argument that has struck down popular liberty wherever it has prevailed on this earth, the plea upon which tyrants have risen and have established their despotic thrones, was limited to the Army and to military operations. But the honorable Senator from Maine is now introducing it into the Senate, and I suppose, when it is acknowledged and acted upon by the two Houses of Congress, it is then to be transferred to the Supreme Court, and the Chief Justice and his associate justices are to recognize this principle of necessity. Sir, when we have arrived at that mode of interpreting our powers, when we attempt to derive them from that indefinite source, what is our Constitution worth? Where is the limit of the Government of the United States created by its fundamental law? Where are the rights of the States? Where are the liberties of the people? Where is the value of this form of government, and this Constitution, that would require from the honest and true men of America a moment's effort to save and preserve it?

Gentlemen have talked about Democracy and Republicanism here. That is a theme that does not concern me. I am no Democrat; I never was a Democrat; and I am too old now to change my name or political position; but I wish to make one remark in justice to the great Democratic party. I was an "old-line Whig." I derived my principles from the Constitution and from the interpretations of that instrument by Hamilton and Madison and Marshall and Webster and Clay. I still adhere to the teachings of my school from those noble old preceptors. I was a Whig of the Clay school. In days gone by I always opposed the Democrats, and they always opposed me. Why and upon what principles? Upon principles of the temporary policy and administration of the Government. What were those principles and measures? There was the old United States Bank; there was the protective tariff; there was the disposition of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands among the States; there were the appropriations by Congress to aid in the construction of works of internal improvement—all questions of policy, of temporary administration. On those questions I differed from the Democrats, and the Democracy differed from me and my great and illustrious leader. But, sir, those questions have gone by; they are obsolete; they are among the years that were before the flood. But there were some principles upon which those great, grand, noble old parties agreed; and what were they? They were for the Union under and by the Constitution. They were for the subordination of the military to the civil power in peace, in war, and always. They were for the writ of habeas corpus. They were for the trial by jury according to the forms of the common law. They were for every man bearing his arms about him and keeping them in his house, his castle, for his own defense. They were for every right and liberty secured to the citizen by the Constitution. They believed that the Constitution was the paramount law of the land, and they believed that it was a crime for any man to assail that Constitution or the laws of Congress passed in conformity to it, whether that man was a rebel or a member of our own Government. They believed that all the rights and liberties reserved to the people of the States respectively by the Constitution belonged to them, and that when any of the officers or authorities of the General Government made aggression upon the rights and reserved liberties of the States, and the State laws enacted to protect, to guard, and to preserve them, whether that encroachment was made by a President or a Secretary of War, or a straggled militia general, or anybody else, he was as much guilty of treason against the State as was Jefferson Davis against the United States in making war for the separation of the southern States from the Union.

Mr. President, those were my principles then; those are my principles now. Time and events have rolled on. The questions and measures that separated the Democracy and me have passed in the progress of time; and it is only those great, immortal constitutional principles and principles of popular liberty that are now in contest. I am their true defender, as the Democrats of that day who have not abandoned them, and shamelessly gone over to the Republican party, are still their defenders of this day. We occupy a common platform. That platform is the Constitution of the United States. They stood there then; so did I. They stand there now; so do I. But I care not what party name a man may bear, if he presents himself, and shows that he is a true, honest, and devoted friend to our Constitution, to the Union under our Constitution, and to popular liberty as guaranteed by that Constitution, you may call him a Democrat or what not, he is my friend, my brother; he is engaged in the same great and noble and holy and immortal cause that I am. I will stand shoulder to shoulder with him; and with him, Democrat though you may call him, I will march to the death; and I will support and vote for him for office, while he is true and honest and faithful to those great old principles that were alike sustained by Whig and Democrat, as though he had always borne the name of Whig.

But, sir, I did not rise to speak of these matters. I rose to offer certain amendments to this bill; and I now ask leave to present them in their order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the Senate with the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the fourth section of the bill. The Senator's amendment will be in order after the amendments made in committee shall have been acted upon.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to present my amendments. I have some amendments to portions of the bill that precede that section and I have an amendment embracing that section. I care not as to the order in which I am allowed to present them. All I want is to have that privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Senator will be in order when this present amendment shall have been disposed of.

Mr. DAVIS. What amendment is that? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the fourth section of the bill, which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out the fourth section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President may, for settlement in the manner prescribed by section four of the act to which this is an amendment, reserve from sale or settlement, under the homestead or preemption laws, public lands in Florida, Mississippi, and Arkansas, not to exceed three million acres of good land in all, provided the rental named in said section four be determined in such manner as the Commissioner shall by regulation prescribe.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized to reserve from sale or from settlement, under the homestead or preemption laws, and to set apart for the use of freedmen and loyal refugees, unoccupied public lands in Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas, not exceeding in all three million acres of good land; and the Commissioner, under the direction of the President, shall cause the same from time to time to be allotted and assigned, in parcels not exceeding forty acres each, to the loyal refugees and freedmen, who shall be protected in the use and enjoyment thereof for such term of time and at such annual rent as may be agreed on between the Commissioner and such refugees or freedmen. The rental shall be based upon a valuation of the land, to be ascertained in such manner as the Commissioner may, under the direction of the President, by regulation prescribe. At the end of such term, or sooner, if the Commissioner shall assent thereto, the occupants of any parcels so assigned may purchase the land and receive a title thereto from the United States in fee, upon paying therefor the value of the land ascertained as aforesaid.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to inquire whether, when the amendment to that section is disposed of, I shall be at liberty to offer amendments to the preceding section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be in order, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to move an amendment to the section now before us. It is to amend the amendment in the fifth line by striking out the words, "in Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas." I will make but a single remark on this amendment. This whole measure seems to have had its origin in the benevolence and humanity of gentlemen to the freed negro. The bowels of their compassion so yearn toward them that they feel it incumbent upon themselves to introduce this great measure of charity for the race that they have emancipated. Now, sir, I propose to extend this measure of benevolence a little further than this section as amended in committee does. That amendment limits the homes that are to be provided for these freedmen to the States of Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas. Now, it may be that a great many of these freed negroes would rather have homes in some other States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I have no sort of objection myself to those words being stricken out, and then the lands may be selected anywhere. They were inserted because it is known that in those States there are some public lands; but for myself—I have no right to speak for the committee—I have not the slightest objection to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. If the gentlemen's friends are willing to accept my amendment, I have not another word to say in support of it; but he says he has not authority to act for them. Sometimes he has, and sometimes he has not, and I do not know when he has, unless upon his own declaration; but I suppose some of his friends would demur to this amendment. But, Mr. President, if you are actuated now by the highest principles of philanthropy and justice—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us try; I think the Senate will adopt the Senator's amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. But if we try and my amendment fails, I cannot say anything upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it is not adopted by acclamation, the Senator can call for the yeas and nays upon it, and he will then have an opportunity to argue it if he desires to do so; but my opinion is that the amendment will be concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. I only wanted to say a word upon it; I am not going to occupy the attention of the Senate more than a moment or two upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator is going to make a speech upon it, I shall be inclined to vote against it.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall only occupy the attention of the Senate for a little while on this subject. I purpose to occupy it for a great while on some other matters, [laughter,] and especially do I intend to take up the Senator from Illinois before I get through.

Now, sir, here are Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Kansas, and all the range of States in that degree of latitude, possessing a salubrious climate and a very fertile soil, and it is very possible that a large number, probably half of the freed negroes of the United States, if they were allowed to select their homes in the localities that they preferred, would elect to go to that line of States, and some of them, probably, a little north of that line. All that I propose to do is, that if you intend this as a local benevolence, one that is to immortalize your legislation for its expansive charity and justice, you shall not attempt to restrict it by limiting the recipients of this noble charity of yours to the southern States. Let them have a free choice in all this free and boundless land to go where their affections and desires or any other considerations may induce them to go. I have nothing more to say upon my proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it. ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us try it by acclamation first, and then if the amendment to the amendment is not adopted, the Senator can call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky demand the yeas and nays?

Mr. DAVIS. I will not demand them until I see whether the amendment is likely to be adopted or not.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me assure the Senator from Kentucky that the demand for the yeas and nays is entirely useless. His amendment will be carried by acclamation.

Mr. DAVIS. I am glad to hear the Senator say so.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky will not be carried by acclamation. I regret very much that I cannot agree with him in it.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me to say one word, we are getting the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber in a soft mood; we are getting them to run in the channel of my amendments; and I want them to get so much momentum that they will be ready to accept some other amendments by the time we reach them. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. But while we are getting into a soft mood, they do not seem to be in a very unanimous mood on the other side. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. Both in the committee-room and in the Senate I was willing to agree to this section; I thought it right enough; but I am not willing to withdraw from settlement, from homesteads and from preëmption, lands in the latitude where white settlers are most likely to go. I do not think that there will be for some time to come a great demand for public lands in the southern States. There is so much land that has heretofore been cultivated in those States that is now in market, that there is not likely to be a great demand for lands for homesteads for white settlers; and therefore there will be no great injury resulting from a withdrawal of three million acres of the public lands in those States; but I should hate to see three million acres, or any portion of them, withdrawn from market in Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, or Minnesota, States where white settlers are most crowding at this time. It seems to me Senators ought to reflect upon it before they give their unanimous support to such a proposition. It is a proposition to take this amount of land out of market, to exclude white settlers from it; and it is not necessary; it is not in the latitude which the negro seeks. There is plenty of land in Louisiana and in the States that are now mentioned in the bill to answer this demand for three million acres, and there will be public inconvenience resulting from withdrawing it in those States; but I think it very objectionable to withdraw these lands from market in the States to which the white people are mostly emigrating.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If I understand the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, it is to strike out the limitation confining this grant of land to certain southern States, and leaving the location of this land to the discretion of the Executive of the United States. If the proposition contained in the bill is just and fair in itself, if homesteads are to be given to these negroes, and they are to be located at the public expense, then, in my opinion, they ought to have the privilege of locating among their particular friends, and in that view, if there was no other consideration governing me, I should vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. But, sir, I cannot vote for the bill itself; I cannot vote to give them land anywhere, under any circumstances; and lest my vote for the amendment might be conceived as committing me to the principle of voting them homesteads anywhere, I do not know that I can vote for the amendment. However, I am perfectly satisfied that it should be adopted by the votes of gentlemen on the other side. I make this remark simply to put myself rectus in curia upon this bill. I can vote for nothing contained in it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My object in assenting to the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky was to hasten our action upon the bill, not seeing any particular objection to his amendment; but as it seems likely to divide the Democratic party, which is not very numerous upon that side of the Chamber just now, and create a division among them, I am rather inclined to withdraw my assent. [Laughter.] If the three Senators could agree, and that alliance which the Senator from Kentucky has just glorified, which has been formed between the old Whigs and old Democrats, could go along harmoniously, I would be inclined to yield and let his proposition be adopted; but I should be sorry to create divisions among our friends on the other side. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole to the fourth section of the bill.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have been from the first, when this bill was introduced by the honorable member from Illinois, very anxious to vote for it, or for some measure of the same kind. I think the United States are under an obligation to provide for these freedmen to a certain extent, and to the entire extent of their constitutional power. The vote that I shall give, therefore, will be given reluctantly, and only because I more than doubt whether any such power exists in the Constitution; and that doubt is not only applicable to the section which is now before the Senate, but is more applicable, it seems to me, to the amendment which the committee have adopted, as I understand, as a substitute for the original sixth section of the bill. The amendment immediately before the Senate provides that not more than three million acres of the public land shall be set aside for the purpose of providing for the freedmen. The amendment in the sixth section is that the United States shall go into these several States and buy land for that purpose.

Mr. SUMNER. We had better adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator from Massachusetts will indulge me for a few minutes, what I have to say will be said before his dinner time, and he might, therefore, be a little patient.

The Constitution of the United States, as I think, as it has always been interpreted, contains no power to buy lands except for certain specific purposes, for purposes connected with the administration of the Government and the exercise of the powers conferred upon the Government. You can buy land, therefore, for your arsenals, your navy-yards, your mint, and your banks; but I am not aware that it ever has been before held that it was in the power of the United States to buy land for any other purposes than those which are specifically made the subjects of the delegations of power to Congress. It may be true that that objection does not apply to the section which is now before the body, because, as I understand it, it merely appropriates or sets aside certain lands already belonging to the United States for the purposes stated in that section; but the difficulty that I have as regards that is, that I do not know where the power exists which enables us to educate or to provide for any citizen of the United States, white or black.

As slavery has been abolished—I suppose we all admit that; whether the States are in or not, there has been a sufficient number of States acquiescing in the amendment to bring about that result—as slavery has been abolished in the several States, those who were before slaves are now citizens of the United States, standing upon the same condition with all who were citizens before; upon the same condition, therefore, with the white citizens. If there is an authority in the Constitution to provide for the black citizen, it cannot be because he is black; it must be because he is a citizen; and that reason being equally applicable to the white man as to the black man, it would follow that we have the authority to clothe and educate and provide for all citizens of the United States who may need education and providing for. In the beginning of the Government, as I am sure will be in the recollection of the Senate, it was supposed by General Washington and by several of those who succeeded him, that there was an authority to establish a university provided it was located here, and the authority to establish a university here was put upon the ground that here the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States was just as absolute and unlimited as is the jurisdiction of the States over their own territory; but even that was denied at that time, and it never was exercised, and it was denied not merely upon grounds of expediency, but as a question of power. But I never heard from that time until now that it was supposed that the Congress of the United States could establish schools anywhere in the United States except in the Territories, which, like the territory of the District of Columbia, are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Now you are about to set aside three million acres of public land within these States of the Union—I assume, now that they are in the Union; if they are not, they will be—for the purpose of educating the blacks and providing for them; to establish schools; if necessary, to endow colleges; to do anything and everything that the Legislature of a State could do.

As far, therefore, as that objection is concerned—which, I am sorry to say, upon my mind, is insuperable; for, I repeat, I am very anxious to make provision for these people—it seems to me that we are without the power to do what this bill proposes.

But the objection to the sixth section is still greater. Not only is the object to be attained by the provisions of the sixth section the same, and therefore the sixth section is obnoxious to the same objection, (whatever validity there may be in that,) but it is liable to the other objection that there is, according to my view, no power conferred upon Congress to buy lands anywhere. If you can buy lands to the extent of three million acres in these States, what is to prevent your going into any State in the Union and buying lands for any purpose that you may think proper? Philanthropy is the motive now; it is a legitimate motive; it is one the force of which I feel as strongly as any member of this body. What is due to these people who have been kept in bondage ever since the Government was established and before, is, that they should be taken care of; and to the whole extent, therefore, of what I suppose to be the powers conferred upon the Government by the Constitution looking to that end, I am willing to go. But as they are now citizens like the white men, if you can buy lands to educate them, you can buy lands to educate the white men to the same extent, and you can buy all the lands, or nearly all the lands, in the State of Maine or the State of Ohio for that purpose. If you have the authority to pass this bill, your becoming the owner of the land for the purpose stated in this bill is not made to depend upon the assent of Maine or Ohio; they may object as much as they please, but the objection will be of no avail, provided we have the authority to pass this bill.

I must say, with all the deference which I most sincerely entertain for the judgment of the members of the committee who have had charge of this bill, and to whose fairness of judgment I have had occasion more than once, and upon every occasion where there was an opportunity of showing it, to bear witness, and with like deference to the opinions of those Senators who are not members of the committee but are members of the profession and perfectly familiar with the Constitution of the country, and more familiar than I am, I am unable to bring myself to the conclusion that there is any such power as that proposed to be exercised by this bill; and I do not think the States will approve of it.

I speak it not in any party sense; I have no party object now, nor have I had at any time during the rebellion. I have desired only that the rebellion should be suppressed, and that, thank God, is now accomplished. I desire now only that the country should be restored to a state of absolute peace; and that, I trust, is soon to be accomplished. But, sir, I wish to keep within the limits of the Constitution, as I understand it, and I am unable to go to the extent that this bill goes, because, according to my judgment, it is beyond the authority of Congress.

Nor do I believe that the States will approve of such a measure as this. Go to Illinois, the State of my friend the chairman of the committee that reported this bill. Take your million dollars into Illinois—for the appropriation is just what Congress may think proper to make it; you may make it $100,000 or $100,000,000—take your money into Illinois and propose to buy the land of Illinois for this purpose, and do you believe the people of Illinois would be satisfied? In such a contingency the result would be that a large portion of that State would be settled by blacks. Heaven knows I have no prejudices against the race. Brought up among them; associating with them in boyhood and since; giving to them and receiving from them acts of kindness, I have no possible prejudice against them; but still I know that nature has made them so distinct from our race that with the mass of mankind there will be, and perhaps must be, more or less of prejudice, more or less of an unwillingness on the part of the whites to be associated with the blacks. It seems to me that, in the case I have supposed, if one half or one third of the State of Illinois was bought up for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this bill, and was settled with blacks, it would produce a political revolution, and Illinois could not prevent it. To the extent of the powers of this Government, whatever Congress may legislate is conclusive upon the States. If Congress, therefore, legislates to purchase land, the States have no right to prevent the sale of their lands.

Go to my own State. At the time the war broke out there were some seventy or eighty thousand slaves, and some eighty thousand free-men who had been slaves, or whose ancestors had been slaves, making altogether about one hundred and fifty thousand blacks in the State of Maryland. My colleague said, and no doubt he has the information, that they are now oppressed in certain portions of the State. He said yesterday, as I see, that the course of justice in Maryland is so obstructed that perhaps they cannot meet with the redress that they should receive. Now, suppose you take a million or two million dollars into Maryland and buy up our lands and settle a hundred and fifty thousand of these blacks there, what would be the result? The whole population of the State is only six or seven hundred thousand. Of that number nearly one half are in the city of Baltimore, and the rest are distributed throughout the other portions of our domain. Suppose this million or two million dollars are taken upon the Eastern Shore of Maryland, from which my colleague comes, they might be able to buy up the whole of that Shore. Do you think that there would be any peace there if that should be the result of a bill of this description?

Looking to the fact that Maryland has been a slave State, and that the feeling on the subject in a great portion of the State has been very strong, do you believe that she would be satisfied to have that portion of our State, one of the fairest portions upon the face of the globe, capable of producing almost an unlimited amount, not only of the necessities but of the luxuries of life, put into the hands of the blacks exclusively? Do you suppose that we should not have trouble in the State? Just as sure as the sun of heaven rises, that would be the result. Then comes force, and force for what? Force—and you will be obliged to say it—to see that this law is carried out or not impeded. Then comes civil war, with all the countless ills under which we have suffered for the last four years.

Now, I believe—I speak it under the correction of what may be the better information of my colleague—the negro is as safe in Maryland as he is in Massachusetts. There may be occasionally horrible outrages perpetrated upon him as there are occasionally in Massachusetts outrages perpetrated upon white men and white women: but I think they are exceptions to the general rule.

Not only do I not see any authority for legislation of this description, but I think it would be mischievous in the extreme, looking to the welfare of the black man himself. I have not shared in the estimate of the black race which many of those with whom I have been in the habit of associating held. I believe that they are capable of as much and as high civilization as the white race. I have seen as much native talent exhibited in the black race as I have seen exhibited in the white race; and I believe, therefore, if protected by the laws which every State is bound to pass, or, they failing to pass them, protected by the paramount authority of the Constitution of the United States, they will ere long become valuable citizens of the country, and the products of the country, the wealth which has flowed into our lap from the products of the slave States, instead of being diminished, will be greatly increased. The opinion that I now entertain I have entertained for years, that slave labor cannot, as long as man is what God created him to be, compete with free labor.

To conclude, although I am as solicitous as my honorable friend from Illinois, or as any member of this body, to protect these people from any outrages which may be committed upon them, to the whole extent of the power conferred upon us, I am unable, much as I desire to do anything that it may be supposed will tend to the benefit and protection of this race, to bring myself to vote for this bill, because, in my judgment, the Constitution gives no authority to pass it as far as the two provisions of which I have spoken, the one immediately before the Senate, and the one which is to come before the Senate, on the amendment to the sixth section, are concerned.

Mr. CRESWELL. I do not desire to attempt any argument in reply to my colleague; I desire only to state the means of information which I have on the subject of the treatment of the freedmen and colored soldiers who have returned to Maryland. I regret that I have not with me the letters I received a week or two ago upon that subject. To make a clean breast of it, I will state that I have placed them in the hands of General Hancock, and have requested from him a thorough investigation of the treatment to which these people have been subjected. I have been informed by gentlemen of the highest respectability, of the most undoubted veracity, and of the most enlarged opportunities for gathering information on the subject, that there are now in the southern parts of Maryland, and especially upon the southern parts of the Eastern Shore, (a region with respect to which I profess myself to be pretty well informed,) there are combinations not only of rebels who have not been in the service of the Confederate States so-called, but of those who have been in the service of those States, and who have returned to Maryland under the protection of the General Government; and that these combinations have been formed expressly for the purpose of driving these refugees and freedmen from the limits of the State of Maryland. Not only that, sir, but I can state from memory one case in which a colored soldier who recently returned from our Army on leave of absence—a man who has conducted himself most meritoriously during the whole term of his service—and who the other day returned to his home in Worcester county, before he had been in that county twenty-four hours was waylaid by these scoundrels and murdered in cold blood. That man's name is John Mills. I can state another case to my distinguished colleague where a colored citizen, who rendered most conspicuous service in his humble capacity as a private, and who returned in company with that same man, John Mills, was waylaid and cruelly beaten, and left for dead. Not only that, but the men who have formed these combinations publicly boast all through that region of country that it is their purpose to drive these people from the State.

It is well known that in that section of the State our juries are summoned by rebel sheriffs, and that they are constituted almost exclusively of the very worst kind of rebels, worse rebels than are to be found in South Carolina, for the simple reason that in South Carolina they have been severely and satisfactorily whipped; while in Maryland, unfortunately, that has not been the case, by reason of the clemency of the Government. I am satisfied as well as I can be of anything that unless the Government interposes by such a measure as this, these people who have done their best to sustain it in the hour of trial will be driven from our State, which I should conceive to be a lasting and a burning shame to the State in which I live, as well as to the Government that has heretofore profited by their services. These are the facts.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am sure the honorable member did not suppose that I called in question the fact that he had received information of that sort; but the information at last, if I understand it, is, that so far as particular cases are concerned, there were two or three instances of horrible barbarity, followed by murder.

Mr. CRESWELL. Not only that, but deliberate combinations formed for that purpose and avowed.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I understand. All I have to say, and I think I have a right to say, and I do not think my colleague will deny it, is, that however true it may be that there are such combinations in that part of the State or anywhere else, there is spirit enough and patriotism enough and loyalty enough in the rest of the State to keep them in order. It is not the first time that efforts have been made to drive the free blacks out of the State. There was a proposition made in the Legislature, when I was not a member of it, by a gentleman from the Eastern Shore, whose name is familiar no doubt to my colleague, to exile them from the State; and at the instance particularly of the freedmen in Baltimore, numbering thousands, I, with others, took a very active part to prevent it, and succeeded in defeating it. There was just as much violence in point of feeling then as now.

But as to these actual acts of outrage, I have seen in the papers cases of most cruel outrages, if true, stated as being committed by black soldiers in the southern States; women outraged to the last degree of outrage; three or four black soldiers hung for an outrage of that description; a gentleman's house visited by negroes, and himself murdered and his wife and children treated in a way that I forbear to mention, and so through all the States. You cannot guard against these outrages everywhere and upon all occasions. There will be wickedness as long as the world lasts, upon the part of men, unless their natures are entirely changed.

I should be very sorry to believe that there is any part of the State of Maryland where the rights of anybody, if brought before the courts of justice, will not be vindicated. I differ from my colleague. I do not know the extent of the feeling to which he adverts, but I think I know the gentlemen of the Eastern Shore, and however great may have been their sympathies with the rebellion, (and to a certain extent, no doubt, those sympathies were great,) I think they would not for a moment hesitate to comply with the obligation of any oath they might take to try fairly a case of that description. That they were wrong in their sympathies nobody is more satisfied than I am, and I should suppose the result of the struggle has proved to them that they were wrong from the beginning. I have been in the habit of associating with those of them who were considered gentlemen before the war, and so has my honorable colleague, and I can say that I never knew a more honorable set of men in my life anywhere, except among the lower classes, men who have lost all their manhood, men who have forgotten all their obligations to their State and to themselves. I should be exceedingly unwilling to believe that there was any such real disaffection in any part of the State of Maryland as would make those who had been gentlemen and men of honor before so recreant to duty as to forget all the obligations of truth and honesty.

Mr. CRESWELL. My distinguished colleague will remember that when on the floor before, he made the declaration that refugees and returned soldiers were as safe in Maryland as in Massachusetts.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think so, too.

Mr. CRESWELL. It was that remark that drew out my statement of facts. I do not suppose for a moment that my colleague intended to question my veracity, but only my means of information. I state upon my reputation as a gentleman and a Senator, that I am satisfied the statements I have made are correct, and that as well by reason of my knowledge of the district of the State in which they have occurred as of the high reputation of the gentlemen who have certified them to me over their own signatures.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the question is taken, I wish to insert a word or two in the section, and I hope I shall have the unanimous consent of the Senate to do it. The section now reads:

At the end of such term or sooner, if the Commissioner shall assent thereto, the occupants of any parcels so assigned may purchase the land, &c.

It has been suggested to me that ought to be extended, in case of death, to the heirs or assigns of the occupant, and I move to amend it accordingly.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope that amendment will be made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope it will be adopted before the vote is taken on concurring in the amendment made in committee. I presume there will be no objection to inserting the words I have suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the fourth section of the bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 36, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Guthrie, Johnson, Saulsbury, and Stockton—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Foot, Grimes, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Riddle, and Wright—6.

So the amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, will the Senate concur in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment to the sixth section.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish a separate vote on the fifth section.

Mr. McDUGALL. I name also the fifth section for a separate vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A separate vote will be taken on each amendment if asked for.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the section that is now proposed to be voted on?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Kentucky will allow me to suggest that the amendments proposed to the fifth and sixth sections have been excepted, and it is proposed to take the vote on the other amendments together. The other amendments are, I think, all of them merely verbal.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask my friend, what was done with the fourth section?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The fourth section has just been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has just been voted, upon.

Mr. DAVIS. The pending question is on the fifth section, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was anxious to have Senators name the sections that they wished excepted for a separate vote, and then proposed to take the vote on the remaining amendments made in committee where no separate vote was asked, if there are any other of the amendments on which a separate vote is requested.

Mr. DAVIS. Those sections, then, are suspended for the present.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are suspended for the present. I think we shall get along quicker if the Clerk will just read the verbal amendments and let us vote on each separately. It will take but a moment; there are but few of them. The first amendment is to add the words "in force" in the fifth line of the first section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be taken up as they occur, if that be the judgment of the Senate. The first amendment will be read.

The first amendment was in section one, line five, after the word "continue" to insert "in force."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section one, line six, to strike out the word "for."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section one, line thirteen, to strike out the word "same" where it occurs twice in that line.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in line fifteen of section one, to insert "or."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was at the end of section two to add:

In the exercise of the duties imposed or authorized by this act and the act to which this is additional.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to strike out the fifth section, and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possession for the period of three years from the date of said order, and no person shall be disturbed in or ousted from said possession during said three years unless a settlement shall have been made with said occupant by the owner satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the question to be now whether the Senate will concur in the amendment offered by the committee to the fifth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to strike out that section as amended, and I do it upon the principle that General Sherman had no power to give the possession of any land to anybody to last after the war. My position is this, about which in my own mind at any rate I entertain no doubt, that he had no power to give the possession of that land during the war or at any time for a day. But the principle upon which I base my motion now is that the end of the war terminates all war power; that if it was competent for him to transfer the possession of this land or any part of it to the free negroes or anybody else, that power was vested in him as a war power, and the moment the war ceased that power ceased, his act under that war power in giving the possession of this land ceased, and the possession rightfully inured and returned to the owners. That is the doctrine of every writer upon international law. There is not an exception to the principle as I lay it down. I have got Phillimore here, who is full upon that point; and all the law writers upon international law are full upon that point, that when a military man does an act during war, under the war power, so soon as the war ceases the act and all of its consequences cease; and where that act is the taking possession of property which belongs to third persons, which is an international power, which is a power of war between independent nations, the moment peace is restored that property which has been taken from the possession of the rightful owner, by the laws of nations, returns to that owner. Upon that principle this Congress has no power whatever to confirm the negroes in the possession of that property which General Sherman placed them in possession of one moment after the war ceased; and, the war having ceased, Congress has no power to continue the possession.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator repeat his motion?

Mr. DAVIS. It is to strike out that whole section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported from the committee is to strike out the whole of the fifth section and insert in lieu thereof what has been read at the desk.

Mr. DAVIS. My amendment is to strike out the amendment that was reported, the whole of the amendment as reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has not yet been inserted by a vote of the Senate. The question now is on striking out and inserting. It has not yet been inserted.

Mr. DAVIS. I inquire now of the Chair whether, if the motion is made and adopted in that form, to strike out and insert, it will not preclude me from offering my amendment. I want to get an opportunity of offering my amendment.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will allow me one moment. The amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the section and to insert something else, which is not a divisible question; but that amendment may be carried and declared in the affirmative, and then it will be in order for the Senator to move to strike out the whole section, enacting clause and all.

Mr. DAVIS. That satisfies me.

Mr. McDUGALL. I object to the amendment, and in objecting to the amendment I object to the portion of the bill to which it is amendatory. To both I object. They are both violations of law, of fundamental law. General Sherman, it is true, may have, by virtue of his military power, been able to give a jus possessionis to the persons within his particular jurisdiction for the time he exercised military authority. Beyond the time that he exercised military authority, or that some commander did who occupied his place, the power did not exist. He placed certain persons in possession of certain property; that he had the power, the jus possessionis if you please, at that time, when he made his arrangements and made his contracts, cannot be disputed, because he was in military possession. But he gave a possessionary right limited by his military power, and that power was governed by his military possession. Beyond that the right of war does not go and never did. While these lands were within his jurisdiction and under his military power he gave to certain persons a temporary right of possession. Now it is proposed to give them, what? A legal right of possession by virtue of an act of Congress.

Let me ask the gentlemen on the other side, lawyers many of them, how you can give a man a legal right of possession by act of Congress against a law or against the legal right of another? All that part of this bill is simply a provision to justify men, under the armed force of the Government, in maintaining a possession not according to the rules of law; the law that governs myself, that governs you, Mr. President, and governs us all. I say that provision of this bill is cardinal wrong. General Sherman, I know, understood the science and art of war; he is a scholar and an accomplished gentleman, of whom I speak with great respect. He understood that as long as his arms covered these people they were within his military protection, and that when the armies were withdrawn they would be subject to the civil law of the country, that is, of the Federal and State Governments.

There is a great mistake about this bill, in my judgment. I would like to protect the men and women of African descent as well as any man on this floor, but it must be done according to the laws which we inherited, which belong to us, and which have to be continued to generations to come if we are to maintain this Republic intact and to be free men. This bill provides that General Sherman's grantees may have a possessionary title for a given time. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, limits it. What is a possessory title? Gentlemen may not be familiar with the term; I am familiar with it. All the Indian tribes have what we call, by way of grace, possessory titles. They had the title first, they owned all the woods, they owned all the prairies, they owned all the land which we have swept from them as with a besom of destruction. We allowed them what we call, in technical language, a possessory title; that is, a title which is good against everybody except the Government, and we can drive them or carry them away as we please. That is a possessionary title, according to law as recorded in all the books.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman from California gives way to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. McDUGALL. I give way.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 23, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CENSUS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. GRINNELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the select committee on reconstruction be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for taking a census of the United States during the year 1866, and report by bill or otherwise.

HORSE RAILROAD IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, which I desire to have passed now.

The joint resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant to Gurdon O. Williams, of the city of Detroit, in the State of Michigan, and his associates, the use of so much of the military reserve on the St. Clair river, in the State of Michigan, known as the site of Fort Gratiot, as is necessary for extending a horse railroad from Port Huron city to the depot of the Port Huron and Detroit railroad, at such rental and upon such terms and conditions as to him may seem proper, reserving to the United States, however, the right of removing the rails, ties, and other parts of said road whenever the Secretary of War shall direct, without any claim or right for damages on the part of the said Williams and associates, or their legal representatives.

Mr. THAYER. I think that this should go to a committee.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I send to the Clerk's desk a report on this subject, made to the Secretary of War by General Delafield, chief Engineer of the United States Army. I will not request the reading of the report, but I ask that the indorsement of the Secretary of War be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

The Secretary of War perceives no objection to the privilege applied for, upon the terms suggested by the chief of Engineers, so far as regards the interest of the United States, but is unwilling to concede the privilege without express authority of Congress.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

January 19, 1866.

Mr. DRIGGS. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] will not object to this.

Mr. THAYER. I object to the principle of putting through matters of this kind without any examination by any committee of this House.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Very well; then let the resolution be referred.

There being no objection to the introduction of the resolution, it was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRINTING PRESIDENT'S SPECIAL MESSAGE, ETC.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That one hundred thousand copies of Senate Executive Document No. 2, the same being the special message of the President of the United States, communicated December 19, 1865, and covering the reports of Lieutenant General Grant and Major General Carl Schurz, with the accompanying documents, be printed immediately for the use of this House.

The SPEAKER. This resolution will be referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

SECESSION—STATE SUICIDE—COLONIZATION.

Mr. HENDERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, the Constitution and Government of the United States were ordained and established by the people of the United States, and not by States in their individual character, for the welfare and general happiness of the whole people; and whereas the doctrine that a State of States have the right to secede or withdraw from the Government at pleasure is most pernicious, and strikes at the foundation of all government, and opens wide the door for universal anarchy and ruin: Therefore,

Resolved, That no State or States can constitutionally or lawfully secede or withdraw from the United States Government; nevertheless, either the one or the other can, by renouncing the Constitution and laws of the United States, and by waging war against them, or adhering to their enemies in time of war, forfeit their organization, all their rights and privileges as a State or States, and their standing as such in the Government.

Resolved, That while States, by rebellion against the General Government, forfeit their rights and existence as such, the United States lose none of their rights or authority over the inhabitants of such States; and the government over all such territory which has been forfeited by States rightfully and properly reverts to the United States.

Resolved, That Congress has "power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States."

Resolved, That all the territory embraced within the boundaries of what is generally known as the State of Texas ought to be, under such rules and regulations as Congress may prescribe, set apart to the use and benefit of the colored people of the United States.

Resolved, That the welfare of both races demands that the colored people be separated from the whites at the earliest practicable period, and that the colored population of the United States be placed upon suitable territory and protected as a dependency of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suppose that those resolutions go to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolutions will be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

There was no objection, and the resolutions were so referred.

Subsequently,

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were referred.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask whether the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] not being in the House and not having voted, can submit the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. When a vote was not taken on the yeas and nays any member has the right to submit a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move, then, that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. I did not surrender the floor at the time I made the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not proceed to make any remarks, and the Chair supposed he had accomplished his purpose when he made the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I made as much noise as I could to attract the attention of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. When the motion was made to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table was not the gentleman in his seat?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, sir. I now demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay upon the table, and tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' LEAGUE.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives be granted this evening and tomorrow evening to the soldiers and sailors of the National Union League.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not object to this resolution, because my friend from Maine [Mr. RICE] has a resolution to offer prohibiting hereafter the granting of the use of this Hall for any purpose.

Mr. RITTER. I object.

Mr. BANKS. I trust the gentleman will withdraw his objection on this occasion, for if anybody is entitled to it, it is the soldiers and sailors.

Mr. RITTER. I do not withdraw my objection.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be on the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

Article.—Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to insert the word "therein," so that it will read as follows:

Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

I now demand the previous question.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask the gentleman a question concerning the construction of the proposed amendment to the Constitution. If it bears the construction I conceive it may, I shall be obliged to vote against it. Perhaps the gentleman can answer the question satisfactorily. The proviso is, that whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

It says nothing about the qualification of property. Suppose this amendment is adopted by three fourths of the States, and becomes a part of the fundamental law of the land, and after its adoption the State of South Carolina should reinstate the constitution of 1790, striking out the word "white" and reestablishing the property qualification of fifty acres of land, or town lots, or the payment of a tax, there would then be no discrimination of color in the State of South Carolina, yet the number of electors would not be enlarged five hundred, and the basis of representation would be exactly as it is, with the addition of two fifths of the enfranchised freedmen. A Representative to this House would be reelected by the same voting constituency as now, perhaps with the addition of five hundred black men in the State. If it bears this construction, and I believe it does, I shall vote against it.

If any of the States should establish property qualification based upon lands, then the same oligarchy would be enthroned on the whole basis of representation, entitled to a larger number of Representatives than now in this House, and elected by a slightly enlarged number of qualified electors, giving power more firmly to that very aristocracy we have sought to overthrow.

Mr. STEVENS. All I can say is that if the law applies impartially to all, then no matter whether it cuts out white or black.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Suppose the State of South Carolina should provide by law that no negro should hold real estate.

Mr. STEVENS. Then the amendment operates. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me put a question. The proviso reads that whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation. There are in California and Oregon something like one hundred thousand coolies. They are increasing and going into the western States to build railroads. Are they included?

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that if they are excluded by the laws of California because they are Chinese, this amendment operates upon them because they are excluded on account of race.

Mr. BROOKS. They will not be counted in the basis of representation?

Mr. STEVENS. Not at all; it was so intended; the word "race" was inserted for that purpose.

Mr. BROOKS. One other question. Why exclude the Indian? Is he not a man and a brother?

A MEMBER. The Constitution now excludes him.

Mr. STEVENS. "Excluding Indians not taxed."

Mr. BROOKS. We exclude them at this time, but are not Indians our brethren?

Mr. STEVENS. The Constitution of the United States has always excluded them.

Mr. BROOKS. Why not, as we are amending the Constitution, embrace the Indian as a man and a brother?

Mr. STEVENS. Because they are a tribal race, have their own separate governments, and, as a general rule, are not citizens.

Mr. BROOKS. Not in Kansas; Dakota, Montana, Nebraska, and a number of other Territories.

Mr. CONKLING. They are taxed there.

Mr. BROOKS. No; they are not; they are excluded from voting. There are no Indians that vote in Dakota; Representatives and Delegates from that quarter know that very well. Why not embrace them all, as we are making a liberal Constitution?

Mr. STEVENS. We have not done it for fear the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] and others would make that an objection. [Laughter.] I call the previous question.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot.

Mr. SLOAN. I hope, then, that the previous question will not be sustained.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, what will be the effect of this motion upon the resolution? Will it exhaust itself?

The SPEAKER. It will exhaust itself on the passage of the joint resolution if the previous question is sustained.

Mr. BAKER. I trust that my distinguished and able friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will yield for a very few minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. That is so polite, sir, that I cannot resist it.

Mr. BAKER. Then I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question: whether it is entirely proper to put through by a vote of this House an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, refusing one word of debate or one moment to raise objections to it for the consideration of this House? For myself, sir, I protest against this course.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I have only suggested what I thought it my duty, if this amendment is to pass. I have only submitted the question to the House. If the House desires to delay this matter it can say so by refusing the previous question. I have no right to demand it; I only submit it to the House. If gentlemen are ready to vote and are willing to go on now and pass this amendment, very well; if not, I have nothing to say.

Mr. BAKER. Why not allow five or ten minute speeches? Take two hours, any way.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, it is not for me to say. I am submitting this question to the House. I think that we ought to pass it at once. I think everybody is just as well prepared now as he will be two or three hours hence.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Allow me to make a suggestion. Let us consider this in Committee of the Whole, with debate limited to ten minutes, if you please, or five.

Mr. BROMWELL. That amounts to nothing at all.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Let ten minutes be allowed to each to express his views. I hope the House will vote on the previous question to enforce that suggestion.

Mr. BROMWELL. I know a number of gentlemen who are not satisfied concerning this very resolution under consideration—about the interpretation of it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If it is in order I will make that motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I would be glad to give gentlemen an opportunity to limit debate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois to make the motion to allow debate for ten minutes?

Mr. VOORHEES. I suggest to my friend from Illinois to allow about two minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I am so much astonished at the exhibition on this side of the House that I withdraw the demand for the previous question and leave this matter with the House.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, if there had not been such an evident indisposition on both sides of the House to proceed to an immediate vote on this question, I should not have asked anytime; although, as the original mover of the resolution, which appears in another form, which form I do not like, I might be supposed to have some little desire to say a word in regard to it. I wish, in the first instance, to correct a mere question of figures which I quoted yesterday from the table prepared under the auspices of the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRILL,] by which he showed that the suffrage basis of white males over twenty-one would give to the State of New York thirty-six members, and to the State of Pennsylvania twenty-four. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] controverted this proposition and I now reassert it. The gentleman's own table differs only a unit from mine. It gives thirty-five to New York and twenty-four to Pennsylvania, making a net gain to New York in the one case of four members, in the other of five. Well, that is not a very vast change in either case. It is not "so deep as a well nor so wide as a church door, but it is enough" for Pennsylvania, I should think, and I hope on the other side it would be enough for New York. It is a tremendous dislocation of the relative strength of those States upon this floor.

But as the gentleman from New York, in introducing his figures, did not use them in support of the suffrage basis, of course I have no issue with him, because they supported nothing except a proposition on which both he and I agree; and so far as his argument went in that way it went against the conclusion he was contending for, presenting anew the spectacle of the waterman in the Pilgrim's Progress, who got his living by vigorously rowing in one direction while steadily looking in the other.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to answer not so much the argument as the witticism of my friend from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; no wit, either perpetrated or intended.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, Mr. Speaker, we considered it very witty over here; but then we are so far off.

Mr. BLAINE. Glad the gentleman thinks my wit will carry a long distance.

Mr. CONKLING. In answer to what we deemed over here the witticism of the gentleman, I wish to say that I had a particular purpose in introducing the figures and statement that I did, and that was not to argue upon or to refute the proposition that I was supporting. On the contrary, it was for this purpose: it is very common in the country to charge that nothing can be done here which in any way militates against the interests or the aggrandizement of New England. It is said that New England is the focus of fanaticism.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought the gentleman only rose for explanation.

Mr. CONKLING. I am going to make a very brief explanation. New England is the place where the man said the sun rose and set in his back yard, and it is alleged that such regard is had to it here that we cannot do anything here that militates against New England, and that various persons here—myself among the number—are opposed to the suffrage basis merely because it takes away some part of the power of fanatical New England. Now, I desire to relieve the proposition before the House of any imputation that it comes here or is supported in the interest of New England and in preference to the other proposition, because the other proposition hits New England. I deny that it hits New England and I deny that this proposition benefits New England; in other words, I support this proposition on account of its own merits and not for local or electioneering purposes.

Mr. BLAINE. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for the patronizing care with which he looks after the interests of fanatical New England.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentlemen permit me to offer an amendment which I believe will remove much of the objection which is made?

Mr. BLAINE. I will yield for the purpose of having it read.

The proposed amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That this article shall not be construed to affect the power of Congress to regulate the qualifications for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislatures of the several States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that there is an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] Any amendment to the amendment must be germane to it. The only way in which the resolution could be amended now would be by offering a substitute embracing all its phraseology and any additional language desired.

Mr. BLAINE. I must decline to yield further unless for the purpose of explanation. I was going on to remark that an additional reason adverse to the suffrage basis will be found in the fact that the moment you make suffrage the basis of distributing Representatives among the States, you inevitably, by logical sequence, make it the basis of distributing Representatives within the States. I want to be understood on this point. If we distribute representation on the basis of voters, the States will take it up by logical sequence, and within their own territory distribute their Representatives on the basis of voters, and a city or district of country which might have a surplus or a deficiency of males over twenty-one years of age would either aggrandize itself or lose its proper weight and power as the figures might go up or down.

You cannot resist that conclusion. That is one of the evils that will follow from the suffrage basis. Following that by a slight paradox, I think this amendment, excluding blacks from the basis of representation, will, by the operation of the same principle, have precisely the opposite effect in the South, namely: if you cut off the blacks from being enumerated in the basis of representation in the southern States the white population of those States will immediately distribute Representatives within their own territory on the basis of white population. Therefore the most densely populated negro districts will not be allowed to offset the most densely populated white districts. It therefore becomes an immediate and pressing interest with those districts to enfranchise the negroes. Do you suppose the upland districts of Georgia and South Carolina, inhabited largely by whites, will, in the event of the adoption of this amendment, allow the distribution of Representatives to be made on the basis of the whole population? By no means. They will at once insist on the white basis within the State. Therefore you make it the imperative and most urgent interest of the late slave masters, in the rice regions and densely populated negro districts in the South, to enfranchise the black man. The upland and rice regions to which I have referred differ in soil, climate, air, sky, and population as much as the Tierra Caliente and the Tierra Templada of Mexico do to-day, or as they did three hundred years ago. While I shall vote for the proposition, I shall do so with some reluctance unless it is amended, and I do not regret, therefore, that the previous question was not sustained. I am egotistic enough to believe that the phraseology of the original resolution as introduced by me was better than that employed in the pending amendment. The phrase "civil or political rights or privileges," which I employed, is broader and more comprehensive than the term "elective franchise," for I fear, with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] that under the latter phrase the most vicious evasions might be practiced. As that gentleman has well said, they might make suffrage depend on ownership of fifty acres of land, and then prohibit any negro holding real estate; but no such mockery as this could be perpetrated under the provisions of the amendment as I originally submitted it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg to notify the gentleman that this amendment of itself does not and cannot execute the purpose intended to be accomplished by it, unless Congress—

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman is going to reply to my argument I will not yield the floor. If he wants merely to make an explanation I will hear him.

Mr. BINGHAM. I apprehend that no possible amendment that can be suggested to the Constitution of the United States on this subject will answer the purpose unless it is followed by further legislation.

Mr. BLAINE. That may be so. But the man who shoots at the sun will come nearer to it than the man who does not draw a bow. I say that the phraseology "civil or political rights and privileges" is more inclusive than the phrase "elective franchise." If you make it so that a State shall not count in her basis of representation any race to which "civil or political rights and privileges" are denied or abridged, then the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] cannot stand, because the exclusion from holding real estate would be a denial of civil rights or privileges.

Mr. BROWELL. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that the objection to this resolution is not that it is intended to provide for a representation based upon actual voters, but upon the population of the classes or races permitted to vote. If the gentleman will allow me I will submit an amendment which I think will obviate the difficulty.

Mr. BLAINE. I cannot yield for any such purpose. There is one other objection to the resolution as reported, and that is a point to which I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee reporting it [Mr. STEVENS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] who defended it. The proposed amendment reads:

Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color therein shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

Now, I contend that ordinary fair play—and certainly we can afford fair play where it does not cost anything—calls for this, namely, that if we exclude them from the basis of representation they should be excluded from the basis of taxation. Ever since this Government was founded taxation and representation have always gone hand in hand. If we shall exclude the principle in this amendment, we will be accused of a narrow, illiberal, mean-spirited, and money-grasping policy. More than that, we do not gain anything by it. What kind of taxation is distributed according to representation? Direct taxation. Now, we do not have any direct taxation. There has been but twenty millions of direct taxation levied for the last fifty years. That tax was levied in 1861, and was not collected, but distributed among the States and held in the Treasury Department as an offset to the war claims of the States. So that, as a matter of fact, we are putting an offensive discrimination in this proposition and gaining nothing by it except obloquy. We are asked to put in something that will enable the southern States to say, "You gouged us out of our fair protection in the basis of taxation when you had the power, and you gouged us so meanly in spirit that you gained nothing by it yourselves." I maintain that we should follow the precedent of former years. And if we exclude any portion of the population from representation, we should pari passu exclude them from taxation. That is fair play, and fair play is a jewel the world over.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that my opposition to the suffrage basis is not grounded on the fact that Maine would lose by it. No statistics that have yet been presented show any loss to Maine; and on several theories of calculation we should gain one member. My opposition, therefore, is not grounded on local selfishness, but upon the belief that the principle is a dangerous one, that it is an abandonment of one of the oldest and safest landmarks of the Constitution, and that it is a most perilous leap in the dark. It introduces a new principle in our Government, whose evil tendency and results no man can measure to-day.

Mr. DONNELLY obtained the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] to yield to me for a moment that I may submit a substitute.

Mr. DONNELLY. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota to yield to me that I may offer an amendment to the substitute which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is about to offer.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is this: can the floor be so farmed out in reference to the matter of amendments as to allow gentlemen of a certain class of opinions to preclude all amendments except such as they favor? Can any gentleman offer an amendment except the gentleman who has the floor? If we go on in this way, the bill may be so amended that it will not be possible hereafter for others of different opinions to propose other amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota yields to the gentleman from Pennsylvania; if the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] objects to his yielding further, he has the right to do so.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York that there has been no "farming" done in this connection, so far as I am concerned. My action has been spontaneous.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not object to the offering of the amendment, if it will not preclude me or others on this side from offering amendments, if we have the good fortune to get the floor hereafter.

Mr. KELLEY. I offer the following amendment in the form of a substitute:

Strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE.—Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color therein shall be excluded from the basis of representation: And provided further, That this article shall not be construed to affect the power of Congress to regulate the qualification for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislatures of the several States.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the House but a very few moments with what I have to say upon this measure.

I shall vote for it cheerfully as a step in the right direction, as tending to bring the representation in this House to a more exact basis of equality, and as doing away with that "rotten borough" system originating out of slavery and by which it was made powerful and in great part maintained.

It follows as a logical conclusion that if men have no voice in the national Government, other men should not sit in this Hall pretending to represent them. And it is equally clear that an oppressed race should not lend power to their oppressors, to be used in their name and for their destruction. It is a mockery to say that a man's agent shall be his enemy and shall be appointed without his consent and against his desire, and by other enemies.

In fact, I cannot see how any northern man can vote against this measure unless he wishes to perpetuate an injustice to his section, because the effect of it will clearly be to increase the representation of the North and decrease that of the South; and this, too, upon a basis of undoubted justice. It means simply that those who do not take part in the Government shall not be represented in the Government.

So far there can be no question as to the merit of the measure; but something more is claimed for it.

It is claimed that this amendment will act as a grand panacea for all the ills that afflict the nation; that by its persuasive force it will induce the South to give suffrage and education to the freedman, and that when we have done this we should halt and allow this sovereign remedy to work its cure.

Sir, I doubt this. I do not think any gentleman ought to vote for this measure under any such belief.

Is it to be believed that the southern people, under the influence of a vague hope that in some distant future they may regain possession of national power, will overcome their deep-seated antipathy and contempt for the negroes around them, and admit them to the ballot-box?

Politicians eager for power might so far overcome their natural prejudices, but the body of the people have no such love for office, no such far-reaching expectations of power, while they are profoundly and directly affected by their personal likes and dislikes and by those convictions which are the result of centuries. Nay, more; the means by which they would seek their object would defeat it, for the right of suffrage once extended to the negro they are well aware would strengthen the North and divide the South. Do they not now have to employ northern men to induce the negroes to work for them? Do they not know that the negro will believe the word of a common soldier from the North rather than the solemn enactment of a Legislature of southern men? Will they be wild enough to hope that they can strengthen themselves and weaken the North by giving the right of suffrage to the best friends of the North? It is not to be believed.

Mr. Speaker, when we vote for this measure, it must be because we think it right and necessary, not that it may furnish us with an excuse for failing to do all other right and necessary things expected of us by the people. We must take direct, not sidelong measures. We must make laws, not arguments. We must enforce, not induce.

To pass this law and then hope that South Carolina, moved by the hope of future power, would do justice to the negro, is absurd. She has 291,300 whites and 412,406 negroes. To pass such a law would be for the governing power to divest itself of the government and hand it over to a subject and despised caste, and that, too, for a faint hope of some future advantage that might never be realized under the most favorable circumstances, and certainly could never be realized by the aspiring class abdicating and relinquishing power. The same is true, more or less, of all the South. In Mississippi there are 353,901 whites, and 436,681 negroes; and in all the States the negro vote would be large enough to turn the scale against the disloyal party.

I shall vote for this measure, not as a finality, but as a partial step, as one of a series of necessary laws; not, as I have heard it termed, as a "compromise." For one I shall not rest satisfied until every security is given for the safety, the prosperity, and the development of all the people of the South, without distinction of race or color, feeling assured that in that only can we find the safety of the South and the well-being of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to a proposition which I had the honor to submit at the last session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress in relation to this subject. That proposition provides that the right of representation in this House shall be based upon the right of suffrage—upon the numbers who are allowed the right to vote in the respective States. The amendment which has been reported by the committee is intended to apply the same principle, but not to adopt it directly. It is an indirect attempt to adopt that principle and incorporate it in the Constitution.

I need not say, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary, in amending the Constitution of the United States, to use plain, direct, and certain language—such language as cannot be evaded or perverted. I need only refer to the argument of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to prove that this indirect attempt on the part of the committee to base representation upon the right of suffrage is subject to evasion and abuse, that it will be found impossible to so guard this provision that some device may not be originated which will defeat the object of it. If, on the other hand, the issue is clearly made—if the provision in the Constitution is plain and direct, that representation shall be based upon the number of those who are allowed to exercise political power in the several States, evasion or defeat of the object on the part of the Legislature or the people of any State will be entirely impossible.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] who professes himself opposed to the principle I advocate, and who made in form an argument against it, made, notwithstanding, in effect and substance, the strongest argument perhaps that could be made in favor of abandoning the proposition which the committee have reported, and adopting the principle which I am advocating. Confining his attention to a proposition which simply provides that representation should be based upon the qualified electors of the States, he said that inequality and injustice might be done by some States allowing minors to vote and other States limiting the right of suffrage to those of the age of twenty-one years and upward.

But, sir, the amendment which I propose will get rid of that objection by making the qualification universal, that only electors of the age of twenty-one years and upward shall be made the basis of representation in any State. He finds another objection, that the word "male" is not used, and that some of the States may give the right of suffrage to women. The word "male" inserted will obviate that objection.

He states another objection also, that some States may extend the right of suffrage to aliens. The word "citizen" put into the proposition will cut off that objection.

The amendment I propose is that "qualified male electors, citizens of the United States of the age of twenty-one years and upward, shall be the basis of representation." I think that nearly every objection he made will be taken away by that amendment; and there is nothing of objection left, except the point made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] which is that in some of the States there is a larger proportion of female and minor population than in others; but to that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] furnished a conclusive answer by showing that the difference is so small it would not have any appreciable effect upon the practical result.

In the amendment which I propose we have a naked simple proposition, by which we put a strong motive upon the States to extend the right of suffrage to the whole people within the limitations stated without regard to difference of race or color.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has alluded to me, that he does injustice to the argument I made by omitting the whole substance of it. Representation and direct taxes here go together. Now, then, all persons, as the Constitution stands, are counted for both purposes—free persons. The women and children constitute four fifths of the citizens of the United States, and I ask whether he proposes so far to impoverish the basis of taxation as to exclude four fifths of citizens for that purpose; or whether he proposes the injustice of subjecting women and children to taxation, at the same time denying them the right of representation? That is the point I made in answer to the gentleman's proposition; and I would like to know what his answer is for that argument.

Mr. SLOAN. If the gentleman from New York had contented himself to wait until I reached that portion of the amendment which refers to taxation, I should have endeavored to make an answer to his suggestion which might have satisfied him; but, inasmuch as he has called my attention here to the connection of the subjects of taxation and representation in the resolutions reported from the committee, I will say now that the fact that taxation and representation are coupled together in that report, and that taxation is to be based in any manner upon population, furnishes to my mind one of the strongest objections to the adoption of the resolutions reported by the committee. Taxation and representation were joined together in the Constitution, when it was formed, as a matter of compromise; the South desiring political power which would result from the counting of slaves in the basis of representation, while they were generally regarded as property, and the North reluctant to yield to this demand of the South, and only yielding it as a matter of compromise in consideration of the South conceding that they should also enter into the basis of taxation to the same extent that they were counted in representation. I undertake to say that in making that compromise, justifiable perhaps at the time and under the circumstances, a principle of taxation entirely unfair, entirely unjust, was incorporated in the Constitution. It was purely a compromise, the South conceding the right to tax three fifths of the slaves, and the North conceding that three fifths of slaves should be represented, and it can only be defended on the ground that it was a compromise necessary, perhaps, to secure the adoption of the Constitution by the requisite number of States.

The principle of taxation thus incorporated in the Constitution has always been an unjust one. There are some districts which have assessable property to the amount of five times as much as other districts in the country.

Several MEMBERS. One hundred times.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes, sir. And for that reason we have refused to resort to direct taxation. There has been but one direct tax laid since the organization of the Government, and that was by the Thirty-Seventh Congress at the commencement of the rebellion. A section was reported last year from the Committee of Ways and Means by its distinguished chairman, [Mr. STEVENS,] continuing this direct tax; but the injustice of the rule of taxing according to population, and not according to wealth and to ability to pay, was so manifest that the proposition met with no favor in this House, and was voted down by a large majority. The injustice and inequality of this rule are admitted and acknowledged by all. It is a principle that has been universally repudiated in this country. It has been adopted in no State, in no county, in no town, in no municipal corporation, of apportioning taxation according to population. Taxes are universally assessed, as they ought to be assessed, upon the property, upon the wealth of a district. That shows the ability to pay, property, not persons; but property ought always to pay the taxes. It is so just a rule that every man intuitively recognizes it. There is no answer to it. The necessity of continuing this inequitable and unjust rule of taxation has entirely ceased. We are no longer called upon to make compromises with slavery. That accursed institution has been swept away by the victorious march of our armies, and slave representation has been buried in the ruins of the rebellion. And one strong reason why this House should refuse to concur in the report of the committee is that it continues this unequal and unjust system of taxation. It amounts to nothing, for if kept in the Constitution it will never be enforced. It is puerile, it is frivolous to be talking about direct taxes in connection with representation. No Congress can ever be assembled which will impose a direct tax upon the people of the country which is to be apportioned upon the basis of population instead of property. Nay, more, sir; by incorporating this unequal and unjust rule of taxation in the Constitution you prevent the imposition of direct taxation, no matter what circumstances, what necessity may demand it.

I therefore propose to have these two principles separated, and in the amendment which I have tried to submit, and which the chairman of the committee has deemed it his duty to try to keep out by moving the previous question, I disconnect these subjects.

The second proposition in the amendment which I shall offer is that "direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to the appraised value of taxable property therein respectively," and that "the rule of appraisal and taxation shall be uniform." That is a principle and a proposition which I believe will commend itself to the judgment and sense of justice of this House. And if I am right in that, the only question remaining is, what shall be the basis of representation?

The main objection to the proposition reported by the committee is that it is an attempt to do indirectly what it is infinitely better to accomplish directly. It is always better to do directly what we desire to have done than to attempt to accomplish it by circumlocution. The committee have sought to get at this principle of basing representation upon those who are deemed worthy to exercise the right of voting, and exercising political power in this country, but they have attempted to arrive at it by a circuitous way. Many of the objections have been pointed out; there are doubtless many others.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SLOAN. I decline to yield for the present.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think it will not interrupt the gentleman. It is in the line of the remark he is now making. I will submit the question, and he may answer it or not, as he sees fit.

Mr. SLOAN. I have already spoken much longer than I intended, and shall be through in a short time. I prefer not to be interrupted now.

The only argument against the proposition which I shall offer that I have ever heard, possessing any weight in my judgment, was advanced by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] and was conclusively answered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] That argument was, that there might be some inequality in the representation of the respective States. We all know that the young men of the old States go out in large numbers to settle in the new States and Territories, while the women and children do not emigrate to so great an extent, and hence there would be a larger number of voters in the new States in proportion to population than in the old. And yet this is a consideration which, in my judgment, ought not to weigh a hair with any member on this floor. It would be only a temporary inequality. In the rapidly increasing settlement and in the natural increase of population of our new States, that inequality would very soon be entirely swept away. I believe the difference to-day between Massachusetts and Wisconsin would be very slight, if any, so rapid has been the increase of our population and the settlement of our State. We are now proposing to adopt an amendment to the Constitution which we expect to stand for all time, and any temporary inequality which could continue but for a few years ought not to have any weight. And when the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING,] showed by his table of statistics that the inequality is so small that it will have no appreciable influence upon the practical operation of the principle, the answer is conclusive. And I beg gentlemen of this House, in considering this question, to come directly up to the true principle. If we are to amend the Constitution of the United States to accomplish a certain object, which I think we all agree in—at least all on this side of the House—that is, that these States lately in rebellion shall yield up the political power which they are now entitled to exercise in this Government, or shall adopt the republican principle of enfranchising the people of those States without regard to race or color; that they shall give into the hands of the people that political power which is conferred upon them by the Constitution of the United States, or shall cease from exercising it, we must do it in plain, direct, and absolute terms, by saying that those who are authorized to vote, who elect Representatives to this House, and they alone, shall constitute the basis of representation. We shall then have a guarantee against any further restrictions which exclude white men from the elective franchise, and an impelling motive which will ultimately break down the restrictions founded on prejudice of color or race, which cannot be evaded, or by any device or ingenuity defeated.

As the gentleman from New York proved very conclusively yesterday, in the very able speech which he made, we should adopt the principle that those who are not fitted by character and intelligence to exercise political rights at home, shall not swell the political power of those who wholly monopolize the exercise of political rights.

Look at the practical operation of the question we are discussing to-day. In the State I represent there are eight hundred thousand free white people loyal to the Constitution, who have done their whole duty in sustaining their Government during this terrible war. The bones of our soldiers are moldering in the soil of every rebel State. They have stood around our flag in the deadly hail of every battle of the war. The State of Wisconsin has six Representatives on this floor. South Carolina has three hundred thousand white inhabitants, disloyal, who have done all in their power to overthrow and destroy the Government, and yet, sir, under the Constitution as it now stands, the three hundred thousand disloyal white inhabitants of South Carolina will exercise as much political power in the Government as the eight hundred thousand loyal people of the State of Wisconsin.

The question as to whether we shall amend the Constitution so as to make a loyal man at least equal to a disloyal one in political rights and power, is, in my judgment, too plain to admit of argument.

The same principle lies at the basis of both of these propositions. Which shall we adopt? I ask the House to do it directly, to say that the basis of representation shall be those to whom political rights are given—that highest privilege of freemen, the right to vote—to those who help elect the officers who govern this country.

I have yet heard no argument which seems to me of any weight against the proposition which I have advocated, while there are many, some of them, I think, unanswerable, to the proposition reported by the committee. When I had the honor of introducing this proposition at the commencement of the last session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, it then met with seemingly very little favor, but now there seems to be an almost entire unanimity on the part of the members of this House in favor of adopting this principle. Let us adopt it like men. Do not let us have any circumlocution about it. The object of all is to narrow the basis of representation as the number of those who exercise political rights in the States is narrowed, and to widen the basis of representation as the number of those who are enfranchised is widened. That is clearly the object of all the propositions made, and the avowed purpose of all who advocate them. Let us, then, say so directly, and so put the provision in the Constitution that no device, no ingenuity can evade or defeat its practical effect. Then every State must make its system of elective franchise as broad as the political power which it desires to exercise in the Government.

Mr. CHANLER. Before proceeding with my remarks, I will yield the floor for ten minutes to my colleague, [Mr. BROOKS.]

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise, of course, to debate this resolution in the few minutes allowed me by my colleague, nor, in my judgment, does the resolution need any discussion unless it may be for the mere purpose of agitation. I do not suppose that there is an honorable gentleman upon the floor of this House who believes for a moment that any movement of this character is likely to become the fundamental law of the land, and these propositions are, therefore, introduced only for the purpose of agitation. If the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] had been quite confident of adopting this amendment he would at the start have named what are States of this Union.

The opinion of the honorable gentleman himself, that there are no States in this Union but those that are now represented upon this floor, I know full well, but he knows as well that the President of the United States recognizes thirty-six States of this Union, and that it is necessary to obtain the consent of three fourths of those thirty-six States, which number it is not possible to obtain. He knows very well that if his amendment should be adopted by the Legislatures of States enough, in his judgment, to carry it, before it could pass the tribunal of the executive chamber it would be obliged to receive the assent of twenty-seven States in order to become an amendment to the Constitution. The whole resolution, therefore, is for the purpose of mere agitation. It is an appeal from this House to the outside constituencies that we know by the name of Buncombe. Here it was born, and here, after its agitation in the States, it will die. Hence I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania this morning to be consistent in his proposition. In one thing he is consistent, and that is in admitting the whole of the Asiatic immigration, which, by the connection of our steamers with China and Japan and the East Indies, is about to pour forth in mighty masses upon the Pacific coast to the overwhelming even of the white population there.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to correct the gentleman. I said it excluded the Chinese.

Mr. BROOKS. How exclude them, when the Chinese are to be included in the basis of representation?

Mr. STEVENS. I say it excludes them.

Mr. BROOKS. How excludes them?

Mr. STEVENS. They are not included in the basis of representation.

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, if the States exclude them from the elective franchise; and the States of California and Oregon and Nevada are to be deprived of representation according to their population upon the floor of this House by the introduction of this amendment.

I asked him also if the Indian was not a man and a brother, and I obtained no satisfactory answer from the honorable gentleman. I speak now, in order to make his resolution consistent, for no one hundred thousand coolies or wild savages, but I raise my voice here in behalf of fifteen million of our countrywomen, the fairest, brightest portion of creation, and I ask why they are not permitted to be represented under this resolution?

Mr. CONKLING. They are.

Mr. BROOKS. Persons are.

Mr. CONKLING. I thought they were persons.

Mr. BROOKS. And so they are, but they are excluded from all voting. Why, in organizing a system of liberality and justice, not recognize in the case of free women as well as free negroes the right of representation?

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will allow me to say that this bill does not exclude them. It does not say who shall vote.

Mr. BROOKS. I comprehend all that; but the whole object of this amendment is to obtain votes for the negroes. That is its purport, tendency, and meaning; and it punishes those who will not give a vote to the negro in the southern States of our Union. That is the object of the resolution, and the ground upon which it is presented to this House and to the country. This is a new era; this is an age of progress. Indians are only Indians; but negroes are men and brothers; and why not, in a resolution like this, include the fair sex too, and give them the right to representation? Will it be said that this sex does not claim a right to representation? Many members here have petitions from these fifteen million women, or a large portion of them, for representation, and for the right to vote, an equal right with the stronger sex, who they say are now depriving them of it. To show that such is their wish and desire, I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read certain documents, to which I ask the attention of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] for in one of them he will find he is somewhat interested.

The Clerk read, as follows:

STANDARD OFFICE, 48 BEEKMAN STREET,
NEW YORK, January 20, 1866.

DEAR SIR: I send you the inclosed copy of petition and signature to THADDEUS STEVENS last week. I then urged Mr. STEVENS, if their committee of fifteen could not report favorably to our petition, they would, at least, not interpose any new barrier against woman's right to the ballot.

Mrs. Stanton sent you a petition: I trust you will present that at your earliest convenience. The Democrats are now in minority. May they drive the Republicans to do good works—not merely to hold the rebel States in check until negro men shall be guaranteed their right to a voice in their governments, but to hold the party to a logical consistency that shall give every responsible citizen in every State equal right to the ballot.

Will you, sir, please send me whatever is said or done with our petitions? Will you also give me names of members whom you think would present petitions for us?

Respectfully yours,
HON. JAMES BROOKS. SUSAN B. ANTHONY.

A PETITION FOR UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The undersigned, women of the United States, respectfully ask an amendment of the Constitution that shall prohibit the several States from disfranchising any of their citizens on the ground of sex.

In making our demand for suffrage, we would call your attention to the fact that we represent fifteen million people—one half the entire population of the country—intelligent, virtuous, native-born American citizens; and yet stand outside the pale of political recognition.

The Constitution classes us as "free people," and counts us whole persons in the basis of representation, and yet we are governed without our consent, compelled to pay taxes without appeal, and punished for violations of law without choice of judge or juror.

The experience of all ages, the declarations of the fathers, the statute laws of our own day, and the fearful revolution through which we have just passed, all prove the uncertain tenure of life, liberty, and property so long as the ballot, the only weapon of self-protection, is not in the hand of every citizen.

Therefore, as you are now amending the Constitution, and, in harmony with advancing civilization, placing new safeguards round the individual rights of four million emancipated slaves, we ask that you extend the right of suffrage to woman, the only remaining class of disfranchised citizens, and thus fulfill your constitutional obligation "to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government."

As all partial application of republican principles must ever breed a complicated legislation as well as a discontented people, we would pray your honorable body, in order to simplify the machinery of Government and insure domestic tranquillity, that you legislate hereafter for persons, citizens, tax-payers, and not for class or caste.

For justice and equality your petitioners will ever pray.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] have expired.

Mr. BROOKS. I will only say that at the proper time I will move to amend—or if I do not I would suggest to some gentleman on the other side to move it—this proposed amendment by inserting the words "or sex" after the word "color," so that it will read:

Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color or sex, all persons of such race or color or sex shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

Mr. STEVENS. Is the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] in favor of that amendment?

Mr. BROOKS. I am if negroes are permitted to vote.

Mr. STEVENS. That does not answer my question. Is the gentleman in favor of the amendment he has indicated?

Mr. BROOKS. I suggested that I would move it at a convenient time.

Mr. STEVENS. Is the gentleman in favor of his own amendment?

Mr. BROOKS. I am in favor of my own color in preference to any other color, and I prefer the white women of my country to the negro. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries promptly checked by the Speaker.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair saw a large number of persons in the galleries publicly applauding by clapping their hands. He must, in conformity with the vote of the members of this House by which he was placed in the Chair, endeavor to the full extent of his ability, hoping to be supported by the House, but whether supported or not, to have this body act like a deliberative assembly. Applause is as much out of order as manifestations of disapprobation. Hissing is not more out of order than the clapping of hands. And if clapping of hands is indulged in by members upon the floor the Chair will find it far more difficult to repress similar manifestations in the galleries. The Chair must again appeal to gentlemen on this floor to set a proper example, and he will attempt to enforce order in the galleries, and persons sitting in the galleries must respect the decorum of debate.

Mr. CHANLER obtained the floor.

Mr. ORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CHANLER. I will yield for five minutes.

Mr. ORTH. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] objects to the offering of any amendment to this joint resolution.

Mr. ORTH. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] withdraws his objection.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read, and then the Chair will ask for objections.

Mr. ORTH. Before the amendment is read, I will premise by saying that it is the same proposition which I had the honor of introducing at an early stage of this session upon the subject of amending the Constitution, basing representation upon voters. It provides substantially that in the amendment we contemplate passing and referring to the different States representation shall be based upon suffrage alone.

The amendment now before the House, reported by the joint committee on reconstruction, does not now embrace that principle, but does embrace what to my mind is a most mischievous principle. And in the few words which I am permitted to present at this time by the courtesy of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] I desire simply to note one of the objections raised by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] in which he attempts to draw a distinction between the State of Massachusetts and the State of Indiana, which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor.

My position is that the true principle of representation in Congress is that voters alone should form the basis, and that each voter should have equal political weight in our Government; that the voter in Massachusetts should have the same but no greater power than the voter in Indiana; and that the voter in Indiana should have the same power but no greater than the voter in the State of South Carolina. The gentleman from Maine, however, states that the census tables will show that by the amendment which I desire to offer at this time you will curtail the representative power of the State of Massachusetts. And why? Because he has shown by his figures that although Massachusetts has a male population of 529,244, her voting population is only 175,487, being a percentage of twenty-nine, while Indiana, with a white male population of 693,469, has a voting population of 280,655, being about forty per cent. Why is this difference? Is it because our voting population is so much greater in proportion than the voting population of Massachusetts? Not at all. The difference arises from the fact that the State of Massachusetts has seen fit to exclude a portion of her citizens from the ballot-box. Indiana has done the same thing. Indiana has excluded one class of citizens; Massachusetts has excluded another class. Indiana has seen fit, for reasons best known to herself, to exclude the colored population from the right of suffrage. Massachusetts, on the contrary, has seen fit to exclude from the ballot-box those of her citizens who cannot read or write.

While we in Indiana are governed by a prejudice of color, the people of Massachusetts, I might say, are governed by a prejudice as regards ignorance. But here is the difference: under the amendment that I propose, while Indiana excludes the black man from the right to participate in the decisions of the ballot-box, she does not ask that the black man shall be represented on this floor. On the contrary, while Massachusetts excludes black and white persons who cannot read and write, she yet asks that that population excluded from the ballot shall have representation on this floor. I regard this as wrong in theory, wrong in principle, and injurious to the State which I have the honor to represent, giving to Massachusetts a power upon this floor of which my State is deprived. Why? Because the exclusion which drives from the ballot-box in Massachusetts a large portion of her citizens, yet admits them to representative power on this floor.

I might carry these figures further. For instance, while Massachusetts has but eight thousand, not quite nine thousand colored population, Indiana has nearly twelve thousand colored population; so that in proportion to the number of inhabitants, black and white, in our State, we lose a representative power of nearly four thousand greater than is lost by the State of Massachusetts.

Again, the proportion of females varies in the different States. This argument has been adduced here by gentlemen from New England. They state that the number of females in New England is much greater in proportion to the number of males than it is throughout the West. The census tables do not sustain this position to the extent claimed. In Massachusetts, for instance, where the female population predominates, the difference between the male and the female portion of the population is only about twenty-seven thousand; while in Indiana the male population predominates to the number of forty-seven thousand. But if we of the West gain in representation over New England, it is because the political power of this Government is rapidly concentrating in the valley of the Mississippi, which is destined soon to become, if it be not already, the seat of empire.

Again, if I had time, I could run through these census tables and show that the white males under the age of twenty-one largely predominate in my State and throughout the West over the number of such in Massachusetts and the other New England States.

The SPEAKER. The five minutes of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] have expired.

Mr. ORTH. I thank the gentleman from New York for his courtesy, and will conclude by offering my amendment, which is as follows:

Strike out all after the word "that" in the substitute, and insert in lieu thereof the following:
The following be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of such Legislatures, shall become a part of the said Constitution, in place of the third paragraph of the second section of the first article, to wit:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number of male citizens over twenty-one years of age having the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The Congress, at their first session after the ratification of this amendment by the required number of States, shall provide by law for the actual enumeration of such voters; and such actual enumeration shall be separately made in a general census of the population of all the States within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as the Congress may by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every hundred and twenty-five thousand of actual population, but each State shall have at least one Representative.

THE SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of this amendment to the amendment?

MR. LE BLOND. I object to the gentleman from New York yielding for that purpose.

MR. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, when the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday reported this joint resolution, he announced, with characteristic complacency and generosity, that he had made an arrangement by which the subject was to be discussed, and promised the House and the country that it should be passed before the sun went down. That threat, however, was like many another threat which a habit of power or an arrogant nature may impel men to make. The gentleman relied upon his ability to force his hobby through this House under a caucus resolution before the sun went down. Sir, this measure if passed will tend to obscure the sun from which the liberties of this country derive their nourishment and life, the brilliant orb, the Constitution whose light has spread itself to the farthest ends of the earth. The vital principle of that Constitution, the soul of its being, is that balance of power between the States which insures individual liberty to every citizen of each State, and harmony among all the States of this Union.

I affirm, sir, that the discussion of this subject in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 was conducted in a spirit worthy of a great people, and resulted in the noble instrument under whose authority we now live. That era furnishes us a sad comparison with the present epoch, when it may well be said that our Rome has "lost the breed of noble bloods," and when, so far as the agitation of these fanatical and partisan questions is concerned, reason seems to have "fled to brutish beasts." How differently and with what wise moderation did the framers of the Constitution act. No narrow and fanatical partisanship marks their opinions or their acts. Listen, sir, to the views of Madison on this very question of suffrage, written during the session of the Virginia convention, 1829, 1830:

"The right of suffrage being of vital importance, and approving an extension of it to housekeepers and heads of families, I will suggest a few considerations which govern my judgment on the subject.

"Were the Constitution on hand to be adapted to the present circumstances of our country, without taking into view the changes which time is rapidly producing, an unlimited extension of the right would probably vary little the character of our public councils or measures. But as we are to prepare a system of government for a period which it is hoped will be a long one, we must look to the prospective changes in the condition and composition of the society on which it is to act.

"It is a law of nature, now well understood, that the earth, under a civilized cultivation, is capable of yielding subsistence for a large surplus of consumers beyond those having an immediate interest in the soil; a surplus which must increase with the increasing improvements in agriculture, and the labor-saving arts applied to it. And it is a lot of humanity that of this surplus a large proportion is necessarily reduced by a competition for employments to wages which afford them the bare necessities of life. The proportion being without property, or the hope of acquiring it, cannot be expected to sympathize sufficiently with its rights to be safe depositaries of power over them.

"What is to be done with this unfavored class of the community? If it be on one hand unsafe to admit them to a full share of political power, it must be collected, on the other, that it cannot be expedient to resist a republican government on a portion of the society having a numerical and physical force excluded from and liable to be turned against it, and which would lead to a standing military force, dangerous to all parties and to liberty itself. This view of the subject makes it proper to embrace in the partnership of power every description of citizen having a sufficient stake in the public order and the stable administration of the laws, and particularly the housekeepers and heads of families, most of whom, 'having given hostages to fortune,' will have given them to their country also.

"This portion of the community, added to those who, although not possessed of a share of the soil, are deeply interested in other species of property, and both of them added to the territorial proprietors, who, in a certain sense, may be regarded as the owners of the country itself, form the safest basis of free government. To the security of such a government, afforded by these combined members, may be further added the political and moral influence emanating from the actual possession of authority and a just and beneficial exercise of it.

"It would be happy if a state of society could be found or framed in which an equal voice in making the laws might be allowed to every individual bound to obey them. But this is a theory which, like most theories, confessedly requires limitations and modifications. And the only question to be decided in this, as in other cases, turns in the particular degree of departure in practice required by the essence and object of the theory itself."—Madison's Writings, vol. 4, p. 25.

And again in his writings, volume one, page 180, in a letter to Mr. John Brown, of Kentucky, asking his opinion on suffrage:

1. "Whether is a representation according to numbers, or property, or in a joint proportion to both, the most safe? Or is a representation by counties preferable to a more equitable mode that will be difficult to adjust? Under this question may be considered, first, the right of suffrage; second, the mode of suffrage; third, the plan of representation. As to the first, I think the extent which ought to be given to this right a matter of great delicacy and of critical importance. To restrain it to the landholders will in time exclude too great a proportion of citizens without regard to property, or even to all who possess a pittance, may throw too much power into hands which will either abuse it themselves or sell it to the rich who will abuse it. I have thought it might be a good middle course to narrow this right in the choice of the least popular, and to enlarge it in that of the more popular branch of the Legislature. There is an example of this distinction in North Carolina, if in none of the other States. How it operates or is relished by the people I cannot say. It would not be surprising if in the outset, at least, it should offend the sense of equality which reigns in a free country. In a general view, I see no reason why the rights of property, which chiefly bears the burden of Government, and is so much an object of legislation, should not be respected as well as personal rights in the choice of rulers. It must be owned, indeed, that property will give influence to the holder, though it should give him no legal privileges, and will in general be safe on that as well as on other accounts, especially if the business of legislation be guarded with the provisions hinted at."

Sir, the history of the legislation of the radical party can be called, without any stretch of language, untimely; it is unjust; and under a Government where justice is the supreme principle, whenever such measures are fairly submitted to the people there can be no doubt as to the result. Such legislation is unworthy of an American Congress, and however good the motive, however high the patriotism which actuated the men who brought forward these amendments, I am confident that, if they are fairly submitted to the people, they will have such an answer as will be not only to their satisfaction if they are honest, but to the welfare of the country.

MR. LE BLOND. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, I will move to strike out the word "Legislatures" in the fourth line, and insert "conventions to be called by the Legislatures;" and in line six to strike out the word "Legislatures" and insert the word "conventions."

MR. BALDWIN. I object.

MR. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, a review of the history of the Convention that framed the Constitution will bring us to the conclusion that the motives of our fathers were different from those which seem to have actuated the select committee which reported this measure. The Constitution as offered to the people for ratification was submitted after a long, serious, and even turbulent debate. This very question of representation, involving as it does the basis of the Government in the system under which we live, and involving as it does the rights of persons and property, not only gave rise to long and earnest debate, but was subjected to great modification and compromise. It involved, not only the structure of this House, but of the Senate and the election of the President; and I look in vain in the Constitution for the power which will admit the passage of this measure. (Curpage 473 et seq.) Let me read, sir, from Curtis's History of the Constitution (volume two, page 145) the record of the proceedings in the Convention:

"As the States were now exactly divided on the question whether there should be an equality of votes in the second branch of the Legislature, some compromise seemed to be necessary, or the effort to make a Constitution must be abandoned. A conversation as to what was expedient to be done, resulted in the appointment of a committee of one member from each State, to devise and report some mode of adjusting the whole system of representation.

"According to the Virginia plan, as it then stood before the Convention, the right of suffrage in both branches was to be upon some equitable ratio, in proportion to the whole number of free inhabitants in each State, to which three fifths of all other persons, except Indians not paying taxes, were to be added. Nothing had been done to fix the ratio of representation; and although the principle of popular representation had been affirmed by a majority of the Convention as to the first branch, it had been rejected as to the second by an equally divided vote of the States. The whole subject, therefore, was now sent to a committee of compromise, who held it under consideration for three days.

"The same struggle which had been carried on in the Convention was renewed in the committee; the one side contending for an inequality of suffrage in both branches, the other for an equality in both. Dr. Franklin at length gave way, and proposed that the representation in the first branch should be according to a fixed ratio of the inhabitants of each State, computed according to the rule already agreed upon, and that in the second branch each State should have an equal vote. The members of the larger States reluctantly acquiesced in this arrangement; the members of the smaller States, with one or two exceptions, considered their point gained. When the report came to be made, it was found that the committee had not only agreed upon this as a compromise, but that they had made a distinction of some importance between the powers of the two branches, by confining to the first branch the power of originating all bills for raising or appropriating money and for fixing the salaries of officers of the Government, and by providing that such bills should not be altered or amended in the second branch. This was intended for a concession by the smaller States to the larger. The ratio of representation in the House was fixed by the committee at one member for every forty thousand inhabitants, in which three fifths of the slaves were to be computed; each State not possessing that number of inhabitants to be allowed one member. The number of Senators was not designated.

"This arrangement was, upon the whole, reasonable and equitable. It balanced the equal representation of the States in the Senate against the popular representation in the House, and it gave to the larger States an important influence over the appropriations of money and the levying of taxes."

"The scale of apportionment of Representatives, recommended in the report of the committee, was also objected to on various grounds. It was said that a mere representation of persons was not what the circumstances of the case required—that property as well as persons ought to be taken into the account in order to obtain a just index of the relative rank of the States. It was also urged, that if the system of representation were to be settled on a ratio confined to the population alone, the new States in the West would soon equal, and probably outnumber, the Atlantic States, and thus the latter would be a minority forever. For these reasons, the subject of apportioning the Representatives was recommitted to five members, who subsequently proposed a scheme, by which the first House of Representatives should consist of fifty-six members, distributed among the States upon an estimate of their present condition, and authorizing the Legislature, as future circumstances might require, to increase the number of Representatives, and to distribute them among the States upon a compound ratio of their wealth and the numbers of their inhabitants. The latter part of this proposition was adopted, but a new and different apportionment, of sixty-five members for the first meeting of the Legislature, was sanctioned by a large vote of the States, after a second reference to a committee of one member from each State."

"Twice had the Convention affirmed the propriety of counting the slaves, if the States were to be represented according to the numbers of their inhabitants; and on the part of the slaveholding States there had hitherto been no dissatisfaction manifested with the old proportion of three fifths, originally proposed under the Confederation as a rule for including them in the basis of taxable property. But the idea was now advanced, that numbers of inhabitants were not a sufficient measure of the wealth of a State, and that in adjusting a system of representation between such States as those of the American Union, regard should be had to their relative wealth, since those which were to be the most heavily taxed ought to have a proportionate influence in the Government. Hence the plan of combining numbers and wealth in the rule. This was mainly an expedient to prevent the balance of power from passing to the western from the Atlantic States. It was supposed that the former might in progress of time have the larger amount of population; but that, as the latter would at the commencement of the Government have the power in their own hands, they might deal out the right of representation to new States in such proportions as would be most for their own interests."

From the above historical statement it will be found that the framers of the Constitution considered the question of suffrage of so vital importance in fixing the balance of power between the States that it was, after full discussion in Congress by the whole body, referred to a select committee of one from each State, again reported and fully discussed, and then referred to a committee of five, whose thorough examination of the subject gave rise to new difficulties, and caused the matter to be referred to another committee of one member from each State. All differences were compromised in a spirit of patriotism and justice. How different is all this from the hasty partisan legislation on this very suffrage question by the present Congress.

A caucus met before Congress organized and chalked out a line of policy and action for the Republican party on the floor of Congress. The whole matter of reconstruction was referred to a grinding committee, whose dictation should govern Congress in every measure brought before it for consideration. Is this wise, just, or reasonable?

I will pass now to the quality of the resolution; and I do so with deference to the learned gentleman who presented the resolution, and whose energy and industry, let me say, deserve the approbation of that side of the House, if not of the whole country.

I have no reason to cavil with the gentleman for his zeal in a cause that is right, but I certainly feel justified in rebuking a zeal which is unjust.

Sir, if what I have just read has force; if the Convention was correct in providing that property and persons should be the bases of representation in the national Congress, I hold that this resolution is too narrow to be of use and too weak to last. It will totter to an untimely grave, and hobble, a feeble and contemptible instrument, from this Congress to every State Legislature to which it may be submitted, to be rejected for its feebleness in a time like this, amid the overwhelming issues which agitate this country.

Sir, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] has pointed out to the House the absolute inutility of this amendment, which seeks madly to strike a blow at the inequality which has been caused by slavery, an institution that is now dead and buried, and by this time stinketh in the nostrils of the people. What motive lies beneath this measure which is proposed to be executed by the stringent rule of the majority in their caucus legislation? Upon its face it seems to be a mask under which contempt of all restriction and all limitation shall be heaped upon the laws of Congress regulating suffrage. In this proposition with a wooden head there lurks some machinery fatal in its intention but harmless in its result toward foreign immigration. The gentleman who offered it presents it to this House as a measure of peculiar protection against the Irishman and the German. Sir, it is a question of race, and I respect the proposition as thus presented. But in debating the exclusive character of this resolution, it is race that is brought before us for discussion. I claim that under this wording of the Constitution the Irishman, the German, the Frenchman, and the American, are one so soon as the foreigner becomes a citizen. This country is the refuge of and is maintained for the white race, as has been so fully demonstrated here in debate, and as is admitted in this resolution. If this is not the white man's Government why bring in an amendment to secure the rights of those who are not recognized by the Constitution? But, sir, to exclude the immigrant is the motive, I firmly believe, of the agitators of this measure. The whole history of slavery in this country corroborates that view. I will quote from a portion of that punk literature which was used to light up the fires of civil war, the statistics heaped up by one of the radical authors whose book was used by the agitators previous to the rebellion to inflame the sectional prejudices of the North against the South. From that fountain they borrowed all the material they had to prove that antipathy existed between the white and black laborer. The same facts used then, if true, will result now in the exclusion of the white laborer of the Northeast and West, will eventually give the finest and fairest land in the South to the black man in perpetuity to the exclusion of the white workingmen of this country. The question which this country has to meet in regard to the black race is how to secure emigration of that race from the South. They must quit the soil. To parcel out to the black race the richest lands in the southern country is unjust to the white laborer and a mockery. The white immigrant must be secured in a preemptive right of the soil on this continent.

Sir, one of the blue lights of the wonderful galaxy which illuminated the pages of fanatical literature I have now in my hand, entitled "Olmsted's Sea-board Slave States"—capital authority on the other side of the House—unexceptionable, carrying with it conviction without reading it. Every fact contained in this book is accepted by the radicals as doubly true on this subject, and every opinion will be accepted as unpolled by any fanaticism or falsehood by them. Olmstead says, after traveling through all the sea-board States, visiting them by turn:

"Man is a social animal." The largest part of the labor required in Virginia is, and long has been, performed by negroes. The negroes are a degraded people; degraded not merely by position, but actually immoral, low-lived; without healthy ambition; but little influenced by high moral considerations, and, in regard to labor, not all affected by regard for duty. This is universally recognized, and debasing fear, not cheering hope, is in general allowed to be their only stimulant to exertion."

"Now, let the white laborer come here from the North or from Europe; his nature demands a social life: shall he associate with the poor, slavish, degraded, low-lived, despised, unambitious negro, with whom labor and punishment are almost synonymous? or shall he be the friend and companion of the white man, in whose mind labor is habitually associated with no ideas of duty, responsibility, comfort, luxury, cultivation, or elevation and expansion either of mind or estate, as it is where the ordinary laborer is a free man—free to use his labor as a means of obtaining all these and all else that is to be respected, honored, or envied in the world?"

"Associating with either or both, is it not inevitable that he will be rapidly demoralized—that he will soon learn to hate labor, give as little of it for his hire as he can, become base, cowardly, faithless—worse than a nigger?"

He led you into the fanatical fields of bloodshed, where you have glutted all your hate against the South. Now, sir, the influence of the black race on American civilization has been pari passu with the progress of the white civilization of this country. And another distinguished blue light is one Helper, another of your prophets—prophets of Baal, who cried on their god to come and help them. He says, in reviewing this whole question:

"The incontrovertible facts which I have thus far presented are, as I think, amply sufficient, both in number and magnitude, to bring conviction to the mind of every candid reader that there is something wrong, socially, politically, and morally wrong, in the policy under which the South has so long loitered and languished. Else how is it that the North, under the operation of a policy directly the opposite of ours, has surpassed us in almost everything great and good, and left us standing before the world an object of merited reprehension and derision?"

"For one we are heartily ashamed of the inexcusable weakness, inertia, and dilapidation everywhere so manifest throughout our native section; but the blame properly attaches itself to a usurping minority of the people, and we are determined that it shall rest where it belongs. More on this subject, however, after a brief but general survey of the inequality and disparity that exist between these two grand divisions of the country, which, without reference to the situation of any part of their territory or to the cardinal points, are every day becoming more familiarly known by the appropriate appellation of the free and the slave States."

Sir, if this resolution takes effect, you surrender to the black race of the South control in the legislative halls in the southern States: by the policy and practical working of all such measures you exclude white labor, and by the exclusion of white labor you give the control of the ballot-box to the negro who will hereafter, by this system of enactments, become the majority of the people under the democratic and established law of our whole policy and the Constitution, and we must bow to the will of the people. Ingraft the black man into the term "people" and you surrender the South to the black race, and the question comes up not between slave and free, but between black and white.

Now, sir, in regard to the relative condition of the country, I here give comparative statements taken from a report made by General Pinckney to the Legislature of South Carolina, found in Elliot's Debates, (see Curtis's History of the Constitution, volume two, pages 168, 169,) and also an abstract from the census of 1850:

"This last table, compiled from page 116 of the Compendium of the Seventh Census, shows, in a most lucid and startling manner, how negroes, slavery, and slaveholders are driving the native non-slaveholding whites away from their homes, and keeping at a distance other decent people. From the South the tide of emigration still flows in a westerly and northwesterly direction, and it will continue to do so until slavery is abolished. The following remarks, which we extract from an editorial article that appeared in the Memphis (Tennessee) Bulletin, near the close of the year 1856, are worth considering in this connection:

"We have never before observed so large a number of immigrants going westward as are crossing the river at this point daily. The two ferry-boats—sometimes three—going crowded from early morn until the boats cease making their trips at night. It is no uncommon sight to see from twenty to forty wagons encamped on the cliff for the night, notwithstanding there has been a steady stream going across the river all day; and yet the cry is, 'Still they come.'"

These statements show that the effect of black labor has been to cause emigration from the slave States, and that wherever this cloud of black labor has rested upon the soil it has driven the white intelligent masses of the South away to the western and southwestern States, and to the Pacific coast. If the black laborer of the South is raised to the position of a citizen, with the right of suffrage, the same result must follow from the same cause, which is to be found in the instinctive antipathy of the white laborer to work with the black laborer in a section where the blacks are in a majority and degrade labor.

Hear what Helper says further on this point, always bearing in mind that slavery, although dead, has left the negro a dependent and ignorant being:

"As shown by the census report of 1850, which was prepared under the superintendence of a native of South Carolina, who certainly will not be suspected of injustice to his own section of the country, the southern States, the cash value of all the farms, farming implements, and machinery in Pennsylvania was $422,598,640; the value of the same in South Carolina, in the same year, was only $86,518,038. From a compendium of the same census, we learn that the value of all the real and personal property in Pennsylvania, actual property, no slaves, amounted to $729,144,998; the value of the same in South Carolina, including the estimated—were about to say fictitious—value of 384,925 negroes, amounted to only $288,257,694. We have not been able to obtain the figures necessary to show the exact value of the real and personal estate in Philadelphia, but the amount is estimated to be not less than $300,000,000; and as in 1850 there were 408,762 free inhabitants in the single city of Philadelphia, against 283,544 of the same class in the whole State of South Carolina, it is quite evident that the former is more powerful than the latter, and far ahead of her in all the elements of genuine and permanent superiority. In Pennsylvania, in 1850, the annual income of public schools amounted to $1,348,249; the same in South Carolina, in the same year, amounted to only $200,900. In the former State there were 393 libraries other than private, in the latter only 26; in Pennsylvania 310 newspapers and periodicals were published, circulating 84,898,672 copies annually; in South Carolina only 46 newspapers and periodicals were published, circulating but 7,145,930 copies per annum.

"The incontrovertible facts we have thus far presented are, we think, amply sufficient, both in number and magnitude, to bring conviction to the mind of every candid reader that there is something wrong—socially, politically, and morally wrong—in the policy under which the South has so long loitered and languished. Else, how is it that the North, under the operation of a policy directly the opposite of ours, has surpassed us in almost everything great and good, and left us standing before the world an object of merited reprehension and derision?

"For one, we are heartily ashamed of the inexcusable weakness, inertia, and dilapidation everywhere so manifest throughout our native section; but the blame properly attaches itself to a usurping minority of the people, and we are determined that it shall rest where it belongs. More on this subject, however, after a brief but general survey of the inequalities and disparities that exist between those two great divisions of the country, which, without reference to the situation that any part of their territory bears to the cardinal points, are every day becoming more familiarly known by the appropriate appellation of the free and slave States."—Helper, p. 19.

Sir, it was stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday, in his remarks when presenting this resolution, that it was desirable to press it upon the country in order that there might be prompt action on the part of Legislatures that might otherwise adjourn. I doubt the wisdom of any such effort to force the Legislatures to act. We are here as the Representatives of the people, and not as their compelling power. It is not our duty to anticipate the will of the people, but to obey it; and if there is any safety in our legislation, if there is any security in the future for this House and for the system of government under which we live, it is in adhering to the strict character of a representative Government, and avoiding all these dangers that beset us in the course of our tendency toward centralization. Centralization, sir, is the constant and direct tendency of all these measures. The temper of the people just come from the stern and bloody conflict of a civil war is not calm and sedate. The people are scarcely free from the oppressive laws which a military despotism laid upon them mountain high. The innocent and the guilty, Union men and rebels alike, were held down by the military despotism which necessity forced upon the country; and now, when the hand of power is just loosed from the throats of the people, and before they are allowed time to breathe freely, you rush upon them, and demand immediate and prompt action on questions which involve the greatest interests of this country, the interests of every individual not only in the South but in the North, questions which have occupied the long and serious deliberation of the wisest and best men that the country has ever produced.

Sir, a great deal is said upon the other side with regard to the soldier element in this country. A constant appeal is made by gentlemen upon that side to the soldiers of the Union. Sir, it is our especial boast that the people of this country, imitating the noble example of Washington, when their liberties and Union had been secured, laid down the sword and retired to the full exercise of their duties as citizens. This appeal to the soldier now, when he is discharging his duties as a citizen, is inflammatory if it is not unwise, and is certainly unbecoming the Representatives of the people. The greatest power of the people exists in the exercise of their rights as citizens, not in the exercise of the power of the soldier.

The question of representation, which is assailed by this joint resolution, is one which has a history peculiar to American institutions. And in violating that principle we are drifting back to that period of history when Roman polity ruled the world. One who has, perhaps, almost as much experience and learning as the chairman of the committee on reconstruction, who stands as high in the government of his own country, and shows more learning, perhaps, in constitutional law, Lord Brougham, says in reviewing this question of representation:

"It is exceedingly instructive to examine narrowly the Roman provincial policy, because it shows to what various devices the republic was driven!"

They were republicans and not democrats; there is a distinction, deep and broad, between the two systems of government—

"to what various devices the republic was driven in order that it might be enabled to extend its dominion while its constitution remained unchanged. It also illustrates, in a striking manner, the grand difference between ancient and modern policy, introduced by the happy contrivance of representation."

Sir, the grand distinctive policy of this Government is that all power arises from the people, and that all power that descends upon the people is exceptional and hostile to the spirit of our Constitution and to the whole system of our Government in form and in spirit. When the Romans conquered any portion of their neighboring territory they fixed upon that territory a system of provisional government, and fixed it upon them for all time. They held them by military power and excluded them from any exercise of power in their Government.

Mr. BAKER obtained the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will my colleague [Mr. BAKER] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. BAKER. With great pleasure.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to occupy but a few moments of the time of this House in reference to this subject. We have learned by experience that it is necessary that whatever is put in the Constitution, and whatever laws we make in reference to the rights of the men in the rebellious States, must be so hedged about with guards and protections, they must be so plain and so clear, that "the wayfaring man though a fool may not err therein," or else they will in some cunning manner devise a way of avoiding them. We adopted an amendment to the Constitution that slavery should not hereafter exist in this country except as a punishment for crime. Yet we find those States now reducing these men to slavery again as a punishment for crime, and declaring for every little petty offense the black man may commit that he shall be sold into bondage. So that even that constitutional provision which we made, and which was intended to knock the shackles off every man who was not guilty of crime in the United States, is avoided and got around by these cunning rebels.

Now, sir, it is necessary, it seems to me, that whatever constitutional provision we may make should be made clear, manifest, certain. If possible, we should make it enforce itself, so that by no cunningly devised scheme or shift can they nullify it. It seems to me that the resolution reported by the joint committee on reconstruction is not so clear as it ought to be; I am afraid that it will be worthless. Several points have been made, several reasons have been given, among others the one suggested by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] in reference to the property qualification. So, too, a State may enact that a man shall not exercise the elective franchise except he can read and write, making that law apply equally to the whites and blacks, and then may also enact that a black man shall not learn to read and write, exclude him from their schools, and make it a penal offense to instruct or to teach him, and thus prevent his qualifying to exercise the elective franchise according to the State law. And they may do in regard to the elective franchise just what they are doing now in regard to slavery. They may provide that no man shall exercise the elective franchise who has been guilty of a crime; and then they may denounce these men as guilty of a crime for every little, imaginary, petty offense. They may declare that no man shall exercise the right of voting who has not a regular business or occupation by which he may obtain a livelihood, and then they may declare that the black man has no settled occupation and no business. It seems to me, therefore, necessary that we should, by some provision in this amendment, settle this beyond a peradventure, so that none of these shifts or devices may defeat the purpose of the enactment.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another objection to this proposition, which lies deeper than those I have already mentioned; and while I do not say that I will not vote for this as the best thing that we can do under the circumstances, yet I do say that if I vote for it I shall do so very reluctantly. And I protest here that I will not accept any such constitutional amendment as this as a substitute for that full measure of justice which it is our duty to mete out. I will not promise that hereafter I will not propose and vote for and advocate with whatever power

I possess a measure which will give to all the people of the States that which is their due.

Sir, I will not admit that any State has the right to disfranchise a portion of its citizens; and if this proposition makes, expressly or by implication, any such admission, I cannot vote for it. I know it is said that the States have exercised the right of restricting suffrage, and they do now in many of the northern States restrict it, and deny the right of voting to certain classes of citizens. Yet by no vote of mine shall there be incorporated in the Constitution a provision which shall, even by implication, declare that a State may disfranchise any portion of its citizens on account of race or color. We have no right to give our countenance to any such injustice. All provisions in reference to representation which are based upon any other principle than that of the people of this country, who are the subjects of government, have the right to vote and to be represented, are false in principle. Such a measure may, perhaps, answer for a temporary expedient, but it will not do as a fundamental rule to be embodied in the Constitution for the people of this country to live by. I deny that a State has the right to disfranchise a majority, or even a minority of its citizens because of class or race. And I say that that provision of the Constitution which makes it the duty of the General Government to "guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government" ought to be taken into consideration by this Congress and enforced. Does a State that denies the elective franchise to one half of its citizens possess a republican form of government? Where a large portion of the citizens of a State—the men who are required to pay taxes and perform military duty, to contribute their money and their strength in support of the Government—are denied the elective franchise, is that a republican form of government? I say that it is a libel upon republicanism; it is not a republican form of government; it is neither republican in form nor in substance.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is said, and I suppose said truly—and it is a disgrace that we are obliged to admit it—that a constitutional amendment declaring that no State shall debar any portion of its citizens from the exercise of the elective franchise on account of color or race could not now receive the assent of the Legislatures of three fourths of the States of this Union. I fear that this is true. It may therefore be necessary that we should—

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. I desire to ask whether the gentleman admits that any State of this Union, at the time of the formation of the Federal Constitution, enjoyed a republican form of government; and if so, how many, and which of the States?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have only to reiterate what I have already said—that, in my opinion, that is not a republican form of government which denies to a portion of the citizens the right of participating in the Government.

Mr. HALE. Then I ask the gentleman, did any of the thirteen original States, at the time of the formation of the Federal Constitution, enjoy a republican form of government?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it is well known to every man who has read the history of our country that at the time of the formation of our Government it was expected and believed by the men who made it that slavery would die out in a very few years; and the framers of the Government resorted to some shifts and compromises in the belief that slavery would shortly come to an end. They were very careful in making the Constitution to avoid inserting in it the word "slave" or "slavery." They sought to make an instrument which future generations might subject to the closest scrutiny, without finding in it any evidence that slavery ever had an existence in this land.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have now a different state of things. That class of people who were then held as slaves are now emancipated. We have learned, by sad experience, that what have been called in these days "the compromises of the Constitution" have proved a Pandora's box, out of which have come all manner of evils to afflict this country. They have brought on this war. They have produced all of this bloodshed in the struggle through which we have passed for the last four years. All these grew out of it.

We now, at the termination of this struggle, for the first time, hold the power to do right. If the people of the United States will but rise up to the standard of duty and mete out the full measure of justice which has been so long withheld from them, they have the power to do it. This Congress has a majority in favor of these principles, and ought to pass such an amendment as is required by the emergency. The States not in the rebellion are numerous enough to ratify an amendment to the Constitution; and I verily believe if the men elected to this Congress as Republicans would vote together for such amendments to the Constitution as they in their consciences approve, they would be incorporated into the Constitution, for the States would adopt them; it is only because of the timidity of men, it is only because they are afraid to come up to the mark.

I say that the people who are behind the people are more radical than we are ourselves. They are radical, gentlemen, most radical. They desire this Congress to do right, and they believe that right consists in enfranchising the loyal people of this country without regard to race or color, and that if anybody shall be disfranchised it shall be the white rebels and traitors who have been seeking to overthrow the country.

Mr. SMITH. I understand my friend to say that there would be enough of States not in rebellion to adopt the constitutional amendment. Does he consider that three fourths of the States not in rebellion could pass an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, or does he consider it requisite to have three fourths of the entire number of the States?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That raises a question which is a mere play on words, whether the States which were in rebellion are out of the Union.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In my judgment, three fourths of the States which were not in the rebellion are sufficient. I do not see how a State which has been in the rebellion can act on the Constitution. I do not see how a State which has abolished its State government as a part of the United States, and has been acting in open hostility to the Government—I do not see how such a State can have submitted to its Legislature a proposition for ratification. I would like to know how the gentleman would have submitted the constitutional amendment two years ago to the rebel States for ratification or rejection.

Mr. SMITH. I will answer with pleasure. When the amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery was passed by this House it was understood by every member upon this floor, without exception, that it would require three fourths of the States. It was a question whether the States of New Jersey, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Arkansas would not pass that amendment and so secure three fourths of the United States. Reference was made in the argument of this question that after the war had begun Tennessee was represented in Congress; that Virginia was represented during the whole war in the Senate, and West Virginia was represented in this House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I decline to yield any further.

Mr. SMITH. You asked me a question, and I hope you will allow me to answer it.

Louisiana was also represented. A gentleman in this city, now claiming to be a representative in the Senate of the United States from Louisiana, was a member upon this floor while the war was going on and three fourths of that State was in actual rebellion. I do not think the Union members have meant to say that the States have been out of the Union.

As I have answered my friend that I believe it does require three fourths of the States of the Union to ratify an amendment to the Constitution, I ask him whether we are to repudiate everything done by those people since the war has ceased?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, that has nothing to do with the question that I asked of the gentleman from Kentucky. Now I ask him, would he have submitted the constitutional amendment that passed Congress two years ago, at that time, to the Legislature of South Carolina? Of course he cannot answer it in the affirmative. It could not have been submitted to that Legislature.

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman did not ask me any such question. He never said a word about South Carolina. The question was as to three fourths of the States. Louisiana, Arkansas, Tennessee, and Virginia held Legislatures at that time which sent men to Congress. To those Legislatures this amendment was presented, and they adopted it, and their vote in its favor was counted by the Secretary of State among the twenty-seven States making up the three fourths by which it became recognized as a part of the law of the land.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. How long will it take to ask it?

Mr. BROMWELL. It is this: if the entire number of States which were in the Union in 1860 is to be counted in the number necessary to vote; and if there were now pending an amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery, and it had received the votes of so many States that but one more would be necessary to carry it: does the gentleman believe that there is such a sufficient State government in Alabama, or that its action could divest the right of Kentucky to her slaves over her solemn vote twice repeated within the last three months?

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman from Illinois will allow me to answer that question, which has been so curiously put. I answer that, so far as Kentucky is concerned in refusing to pass the constitutional amendment, I very much regret it; for everybody knows I voted for it with pleasure, in dangerous hours, and when a man of my political complexion stood very little chance of getting even into the office of constable in my State. But I stood up, and I have asserted on this floor, and reassert it now, that it required three fourths of the States, including Alabama, which is on the list, to abolish slavery in Kentucky; and Alabama, with the other twenty-six States, having done it, it is a part of the fundamental law of the land, and Kentucky is bound to obey it. But, sir, without three fourths of the States no State was under obligation to receive it or recognize it as the law of the land. I say that all the States are in the Union, because we kept them in by force of arms.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I did not intend to discuss the question whether these States were in the Union or out of it. I do not understand that that has very much to do with the question before the House. I was betrayed into it by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH.]

I do not see, as I said before, if these States had been in rebellion for ten years, and were still in the Union to be counted for the amendment of the Constitution, that it would be possible for us to amend the Constitution of the United States so long as they remained in rebellion. And if these States have been in the Union all the time, why do not the Senators from those States who hold over, and who by the terms of their election would be entitled to represent their States, now come and take their seats in the Senate?

Mr. SMITH. Because you will not let them. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. We passed no law saying that they shall not come in. Their credentials are already in the Senate. They took their hats one day and walked out. They may come in and take off their hats and sit down to-day. Why not? If they have been in the Union all the time, why may not Robert Toombs or Jeff. Davis or John C. Breckinridge, or any of those whose terms are unexpired, come in again?

A MEMBER. They have been expelled.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think Breckinridge was the last Senator elected from Kentucky before the rebellion, and would hold over to the present time. Why not come and take his seat?

Mr. SMITH. Now I hope the gentleman will allow me to put in a word.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH. One word on the Breckinridge question. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I only occupy the floor by the courtesy of my colleague.

Mr. SMITH. I happen to have been in the Legislature of Kentucky when Mr. Breckinridge was in the Senate of the United States. I voted requesting him to resign his seat, and in case he did not, to ask the Senate of the United States to expel him because of his treason. He was expelled because of his treason against the Government of the United States, and I hope the time will never come when any American citizen who has the privilege of representing any portion of this people will allow such a man as John C. Breckinridge to take a seat in the Senate of the United States. But it is not fair in argument to bring up such a case as that. Why does not the gentleman vote to allow Mr. Maynard and Mr. Stokes, men who assisted in electing him to this House, to take their seats here and represent that State in this House?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope the time will never come when the Congress of the United States will allow a State still in open rebellion and treason against the Government of the United States to take its place in the government of the nation. And if we are not to allow them to take their seats here because of treason and rebellion, why does not the same argument reach back to the State itself which is in rebellion and treason? The gentleman asks to let Mr. Stokes and Mr. Maynard take their seats. Sir, for those gentlemen I entertain a high respect. I know they have continued faithful among the traitors, have been true to the Union when it was dangerous for men in their position to be so. But it is no question about men. The question for Congress to decide is, as to their power of sending their agent here, not the character of that agent. It is the character of the people. Is that people entitled to a Representative upon this floor? If it is in a position to be represented on this floor as a State of the Union, then we are not to scrutinize the agent they send here and degenerate into a committee to decide upon the more character of the man who is sent to represent it. We go behind the agent. We go to the question as to the constituency. The question is, is it entitled to be represented? not, who is the agent they send here?

Mr. STROUSE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, I must decline to yield.

Mr. BAKER. Inasmuch as I do not perceive that this side debate is exceedingly germane to the question before the House, and inasmuch as I am beginning to apprehend that this performance may turn out to be the play of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out, though I desire to be exceedingly courteous to my colleague from Illinois, I beg him to bring his remarks to a conclusion.

A MEMBER. And let Hamlet resume his play. [Laughter.]

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty-three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will occupy but a very few moments more. To come back to the question under immediate consideration, I would much prefer, if we are to adopt any amendment to the Constitution on the basis of representation, that we should put it upon the voting basis, or, if that cannot be adopted, then let us adopt a provision which shall put it out of the power of these States to circumvent it, and by any shift, or trick to get round it that by declaring if this class of people of African descent are not allowed the elective franchise in any State, no matter upon what pretext, whether it is because of lack of intelligence, or because of lack of property qualification, or any other; if they are debarred the right of exercising the elective franchise, then they shall not be counted in the basis of representation. In that way we shall get rid of the possibility of any State evading the effect of this constitutional provision by a shift or a trick. I do not say that I shall not vote for the amendment. I hope, however, that it may be amended in this particular, and then if that is the best that we can get, I will vote for it; but at the same time I will not accept it as a substitute for that greater justice which we ought to do.

Mr. BAKER resumed the floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BAKER. I will yield for three minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to recommit the resolution and pending amendments to the committee on reconstruction, with instructions to report an amendment to the Constitution which shall—

1. Apportion direct taxes among the several States according either to property or numbers of population, in the discretion of Congress, excluding Indians not taxed.

2. That shall apportion representation among the States on the basis of adult male voters who are citizens of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to allowing the gentleman to make the motion?

Mr. BLAINE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] being upon the floor, can make it, but the gentleman from Ohio cannot.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will do it.

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to say that when the gentleman now upon the floor concludes his speech, if I can get the floor I will move to refer the resolution and pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Then all these propositions can come in and general debate can be had on them, and the sense of the House can be ascertained as to what they desire.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to move an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

The SPEAKER. It is not pending. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] should make it himself, it would be in order; but he cannot yield the floor to another gentleman to offer an amendment or make such a motion.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will offer it.

Mr. BAKER. I must decline to do so.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Then I give notice that at the proper time I will make the motion myself.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I certainly am exceedingly anxious to have an amendment adopted at the earliest practicable moment achieving the general purpose of supplying a more just basis of representation, and I was at one time favorably struck with the proposed amendment. But upon more critical examination I raise upon it the following points of objection, to which I beg to draw the attention and candid consideration of the House:

The proposed amendment fails, as I conceive, in its very terms, to adequately effect its own object; that is, it fails to provide, and by apt words to secure, a representation in this Government which shall properly correspond with the measure of suffrage upon which it rests. To explain this, let it be observed that under the operation of this amendment three contingencies may happen: first, a given State may enact universal suffrage, and in that case the operation of the amendment would be all right; second, such State might deny or abridge the elective franchise on account of race or color, and in that case the amendment would operate to exclude from the basis of representation all persons of such race or color, and so effect the end proposed by the committee; but third, such State might deny or abridge the elective franchise, not on account of race or color, but on some other account—as, for instance, property or intelligence—and in such case though very large numbers of her people might be disfranchised, yet under the operation of this amendment, they would all be counted in the basis of her representation, which would be highly unjust in itself, besides potentially leaving the identical obnoxious thing standing in our representative system which it is the object of this amendment to extirpate! The object we have in view is to deprive a State of the privilege of disfranchising any portion of her citizens and at the same time having them counted in the basis of her representation. And I humbly submit that this object is not accomplished by leaving it to a State, as this proposed amendment does, to disfranchise whom she pleases and to any extent she pleases, provided only it be not for race or color, and then allowing the persons so disfranchised to be counted in the basis of her representation.

That I am right in this interpretation of the proposed amendment is apparent on inspection of its language. The primary basis of representation which it provides is the whole number of persons in each State, which I clearly think is the right primary basis; and the only limitations it imposes are, first, untaxed Indians, and secondly, all persons of any race or color who may be discriminated against as to suffrage on account of race or color. There is no provision whatever covering any other sort of discrimination; from which it clearly results, as I have stated, that large numbers of persons might be excluded from the franchise, and yet be counted in the basis of representation if only they were excluded on some other account than color or race. This, it appears to me, is too narrow a foundation to rest the proposed remedy upon. For, in my opinion, there are other grounds upon which men may be disfranchised, which are quite as odious and quite as dangerous to liberty as disfranchisement on account of race or color. A property qualification is one, the whole strength of which was tested by Franklin's question. A man owns an ass to-day and he votes. To-night his ass dies, and to-morrow he cannot vote. "Now," said Franklin, "who has the vote—the man or the ass?" At all events, the right to the vote died with the ass.

I am reluctant to indorse an amendment to the Constitution, framed in this day of growing liberty, framed by the party of progress, intended to make representative power in this Government correspond with the quantum of political justice on which it is based, and yet which leaves any State in the Union perfectly free to narrow her suffrage to any extent she pleases, imposing proprietary and other disqualifying tests, and still strengthening her aristocratic power in the Government by the full count of her disfranchised people, provided only she steers clear of a test based on race or color.

Nor am I to be answered that such would not probably be the practical fact, though the power existed to make it so. In framing an amendment of our fundamental law, which may exist for centuries without a change, we should be exceedingly modest in undertaking to prejudice that power left to a State to very materially narrow its suffrage, and yet retain its undiminished weight in the system, would never be exercised by such State. The wiser course, it appears to me, now we have taken it in hand, is to put the right thing in the Constitution, so wording it that no considerable body of the people in any State can be disfranchised, no matter on what account, and still be numbered in her basis of representation. Then the mischief we are aiming at will be removed—not scotched—removed with the glad sanction of the people; and the guarantee of its removal will be in the terms of the Constitution itself, and not left to the fortuitous pleasure of particular States, free to go on, in great measure, as heretofore, excluding their people from suffrage and yet having them counted in the basis of their representation. The fundamental idea is to leave the primary basis of representation where it was placed by our fathers, the whole body of the people, then excluding from the count according to disfranchisement by the States, no matter whether for race or color or other cause. No State should reserve in her basis of representation persons disfranchised and not represented, no matter on what ground she so excludes them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BAKER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I believe much good has been done by this debate; and I believe it is the desire of the friends of this measure, or of the principles involved in this proposition, that some speedy action should be had upon it upon the ground that many of the State Legislatures are now in session, and would be called to act upon it before their adjournment in States where they have only biennial sessions. Now, sir, I move—and I believe that the object can be accomplished by an acquiescence in it by the House—that this subject be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union under the five minutes' rule, and be there discussed under the five minutes' rule, and be continued as a special order until it is disposed of. Then, sir, every gentleman will have an opportunity to talk five minutes about this question, and to offer amendments or propose substitutes; and they can be voted upon in committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that it would be impossible for any gentleman to approach an argument upon a question of this sort in five minutes.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. If a liberal time for discussion is allowed, I will not object. But I do object to being restricted to five minutes, after gentlemen on the other side of the House have exhausted the full time in their speeches.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If there be no objection, I will agree to make it ten minutes.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Make it fifteen minutes.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Say thirty minutes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I cannot consent to make it more than ten minutes.

Mr. LATHAM. I object to any limitation of debate on questions of this importance, at least to any limitation less than thirty minutes.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Cannot a motion be made to go into Committee of the Whole, and join with that motion a proposition to limit debate?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion would be in order; but there have been already made by the House several special orders in Committee of the Whole. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] can be acted on now only by unanimous consent.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well, I have an amendment, or some amendments to offer, which I think will meet the views of my colleague [Mr. BAKER] by whose courtesy I am now occupying the floor. By his permission, I will indicate what those amendments are. I propose to strike out the words "direct taxes" from the resolution reported by the joint committee; also strike out the words "excluding Indians not taxed;" also insert before the word "counting" the words "which shall be determined by," and then to add the following:

And no State within this Union shall prescribe or establish any property qualification which may or shall in anywise abridge the elective franchise.

If that meets the views of my colleague, I will ask him to offer it.

Mr. BAKER. It does not meet my views.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am very sorry it does not. Will my colleague offer it as meeting my views, not his own?

Mr. BAKER. If it be in conformity with the rules of proceedings to offer this amendment as meeting the views of my colleague [Mr. INGERSOLL] and not my own I will do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman having the floor can submit the amendment on behalf of his colleague. But it must be an amendment in the nature of a substitute, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the joint resolution with the modifications indicated.

Mr. BAKER. Then I offer this amendment at the request of my colleague, [Mr. INGERSOLL.]

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert—That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

Art. — Representation shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by counting the whole number of persons in each State: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation; and no State within this Union shall prescribe or establish any property qualifications which may or shall in anywise abridge the elective franchise.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, the gravest question that can be presented to the Representatives of the people is a proposition to amend the fundamental law of the Republic. It should always be approached with hesitation, considered duly, both with regard to the previous history of the Republic and its probable future, and decided upon only after the most mature deliberation and full understanding of that which is proposed, and of its application.

This proposition now under consideration, coming as it does from the joint committee of fifteen, is before the House, with greater solemnity, if I may use the phrase, than any that has been presented upon the motion of a single member. That committee demand for it our immediate consideration and action. We have a right, from the character of that committee and the business with which it is charged, to suppose that this proposition is a portion of that plan of reconstruction which they propose to submit to this Congress; and that in their wisdom they believe the best method of presenting their plan is thus in detail, commencing with a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States. Having this grave sanction, and being urged by the weight and authority of that committee, this proposition, as it seems to me, deserves a more full consideration than it has received, or is likely to receive, in the present temper of the House.

My opposition to this amendment is based upon several grounds. One would suppose that with the magnitude of the undertaking devolved upon this committee, aiming to heal a wound in the Constitution of the Republic and to give new life to it hereafter, they would have presented a measure which was founded upon principle, and which would stand the criticism of all parties, not only of the present time but of all future time. We should expect that such a measure would at least be based upon the principle of justice, to be carried out so as to accord equality to all the citizens of the States. But upon examining this proposition I find upon its face that it has not the principle of justice in it. In my judgment justice requires that the qualification of electors for members of this House and for electors of President and Vice President of the United States—in other words, for the two popular branches of this great Government—should be defined in the fundamental law. Upon this point let me quote the words of Madison, written in his mature years to a distinguished son of the Republic seeking advice from him. He says:

"The right of suffrage, the rule of apportioning representation, and the mode of appointing to and removing from office, are fundamentals in a free Government, and ought to be fixed by the Constitution."

The offering of an amendment implies that there is a difficulty to be removed, and the proposition for an amendment should be one that will remove that difficulty. The difficulty hitherto found in the Constitution as it stands is that the qualifications of these voters have been left for each of the States to determine within their several jurisdictions. In other words, the General Government has made the several States the instruments or the means for determining those qualifications and for conducting the elections. This power has been used for mischief, and this amendment proposes that that mischief shall no longer intervene. That certainly should be the remedy proposed. Now the question of all others raised by the amendment and presented for us to consider is this: it is now proposed to have the qualifications of these electors to be determined, not as it was in 1789 by some thirteen constituencies, but by some thirty-six or more constituencies, with no other restrictions than those contained in the proviso. Will this prevent the recurrence of the past difficulties, and save us from such new ones as may be anticipated from the new state of things if the Constitution should remain as it is?

It has been said that in the Convention of 1787 a difficulty was found in fixing these qualifications so that they should be uniform in all the States; but that difficulty then was certainly not one of principle, for the property qualification existed in many if not in all of the States. If any other difficulty existed it is now removed, or substantially removed, since in three fourths of the States that would be required to ratify an amendment on this subject, nearly all of them have made the suffrage so nearly universal that the distinction is scarcely material. The qualifications of voters for members of Congress are so nearly alike that the differences can easily be reconciled, and when once reconciled, they can be incorporated in a provision for an amendment of the Constitution. Certainly, sir, it is less difficult in a Congress composed of less than three hundred men to agree to a proposition which will meet the views of the whole country on this question of suffrage than to adopt a proposition which, when submitted to and adopted by the requisite number of States, must be carried into effect by as many Legislatures as there are States and in a different manner by each, and which in being carried into effect must be acted upon by as many thousands of men in State conventions and Legislatures as there are hundreds in this Congress.

The old difficulty, therefore, does not now exist, and we can, if we choose, having in view the difficulties of the past and wishing to avoid any in the future, meet this question and settle it upon the principle of justice by endeavoring to insert a new provision in the fundamental law, which when adopted will place the qualifications of voters for members of Congress beyond the reach of State conventions or Legislatures.

Again, in carrying this amendment into effect, I find the principle of justice overlooked and an essential element of injustice infused into it. If this amendment should go into effect, the laws of the States continuing as they now stand, there are four million freemen, three fifths only of whom were counted heretofore in the basis of representation, but all of whom will now be excluded not only from the basis of representation, but from ever having a voice in the election of Representatives. We yield to States the power to exclude an entire race living among them, which has hitherto been a class by themselves, but who must now be counted as citizens. They may exclude not only that race, but people of other races who immigrate to this country, and thus contravene the long-settled policy upon which we open our ports to immigrants from all climes, and of all nations and races, and seek here to build up a nation which will not rest upon the basis of any narrow or clan-nish origin, but which will embrace the best blood of the whole human race.

Again, Mr. Speaker, an amendment proposing to fix the qualifications of voters for members of this House should contain the element of equality. A man in Vermont should have just as much voice in electing a Representative here as a man in Alabama. They are equally citizens of the United States. In electing members of this House, when the electors deposit their ballots, they cease to be citizens of the small republics composing this great nation; they are citizens of the great Republic; they are exercising their duty to the paramount authority, the supreme government of the land, and to the people. This amendment proposes to leave the determination of these qualifications to the Legislatures or constitutional conventions in every State. All of them may agree on several points. All may require that voters shall be male citizens possessing a certain qualification of age and residence. On other points they may differ essentially. Some may impose the additional requirement of paying taxes; some may fix an educational requirement; some may admit aliens; some may admit those who have merely declared their intention to become citizens. Thus we may find constituencies composed of different classes of citizens or inhabitants voting upon varying qualifications in different districts and all electing members of this House. Such, it seems to me, should not be the case. There not being an equality, of course the desirable element of uniformity is wanting. The fact that a man is entitled to vote in Indiana for a Representative to this House is no evidence that if he should remove to Kentucky he will be entitled to vote there after the required residence. In the State to which he goes he is not entitled in this respect to the privileges and immunities which he enjoyed in the State which he leaves.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment, that I may ask a question for information?

Mr. JENCKES. Certainly, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If this amendment should be ratified by three fourths of the States, is there anything in it which will prevent a State from requiring of a colored man a qualification which shall not be required of a white man? For instance, suppose that this amendment shall become a part of the Constitution, may not the Legislature of South Carolina declare that no colored man shall be allowed to exercise the elective franchise until he is sixty years of age, while the white man can vote on attaining the age of twenty-one?

Mr. JENCKES. This amendment contains no restriction which will prevent a State from making a discrimination as to age or residence. It may discriminate in those respects, as it may do so in reference to a qualification of property or of taxation.

This merely enjoins the Legislatures and conventions of the States from discriminating on account of race or color, and leaves open every other qualification, or anything which may be declared a qualification for the exercise of the right of suffrage on the part of the States.

There is no equality, and there can be no equality in the proposed amendment. It seems to me, therefore, if we undertake to amend the fundamental law at all in this respect, we ought to agree upon what should be the qualification of voters for members of this House, embodying them in the proposed amendments to submit to the Legislatures of the States. Then there would be a definite proposition; and that I believe, if it emanated from this House, would have substantial equality and justice; would have the elements of equality and uniformity, and be enforced without difficulty in every State of the Union.

Then there is another and more formidable objection indicated in part by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAKER.] This amendment, as it stands, merely prohibits the States from any discrimination on account of color or race, and it leaves open to the States to discriminate in reference to property and to taxation. There are many States where the payment of a tax is required as a condition of voting. In former times all the States required a property qualification. It is only since the war that the constitution of South Carolina adopted in 1790 has been abrogated.

Mr. HILL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. JENCKES. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question, because I know he is a good lawyer, and I regard his opinion as one that will be beneficial to the House. I desire to know whether there is anything in the proposed amendment which will prohibit the State of South Carolina, or any other State, from inserting in the law regulating suffrage a provision that no person shall vote who has ever hitherto been a slave, and thus deprive those who have been slaves, and who have been emancipated, from voting?

Mr. JENCKES. That is another ground of discrimination in addition to those which have been already proposed. The proposed amendment does not prohibit discrimination arising upon quality or condition.

I was alluding to another one. Some of the southern States, up to the breaking out of the war, had constitutions which prescribed a property qualification. Suppose this amendment were adopted and the State of South Carolina chose to annul the constitution recently proclaimed and to go back to that of 1790, and that the word "white" should be stricken out of it, I desire to ask how many freedmen, how many persons of African descent can be found who own in fee fifty acres of land or a town lot, or who have paid a tax of three shillings sterling. As far as I can ascertain from the statistics there would not be, if that constitution were restored and the word "white" omitted, over five hundred additional qualified voters in that State.

What sort of a community would that be? Since the basis of representation has been increased by emancipation every person of African descent would count in ascertaining the number of Representatives to this House. She would have an increased representation upon this floor and a diminished voting constituency. The same persons who carried that State into the rebellion, and urged secession on her sister States, would still select the Representatives by continuing to hold control in their elections. They would establish more firmly than ever the aristocracy of landholders. There would be an oligarchy which it would be impossible for us to overthrow.

Mr. Speaker, ever since the adoption of the constitution of 1790 down to the time of firing on Fort Sumter, South Carolina was in practical relation to this Government as a State of this Union. She had been considered as having a republican form of government, and that which we had guaranteed as such for many years we would be bound to guaranty to her hereafter. Stronger than ever this oligarchy would be enthroned upon their old seat of power, not upheld merely by slaves beneath it, but by the power of the General Government above and around it. She might make any of the discriminations which I have suggested, of age, of residence, of previous servitude, and of ignorance or poverty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Whether it would not be competent, in his judgment, for the State of South Carolina, if this amendment is adopted, to discriminate against and exclude from the polls all Union men who had given aid and comfort to the United States.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman has just anticipated me. If the loyal States have the power (and they have exercised it) to exclude rebels, certainly South Carolina, after she has been thus reconstructed, restored, and strengthened in the Union, would have a right to exclude all those who had not followed her fortune in the rebellion.

It is not necessary to follow out this line of illustration any further. It must be apparent to all who hear me.

Mr. COOK. Can the gentleman say how many would be excluded under that rule?

Mr. JENCKES. Very few in South Carolina; in other States perhaps many. As to how it would operate in Tennessee and Louisiana, perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] can give us information. Many would be excluded there.

If this amendment should be adopted it would be hailed with delight in every State lately in rebellion. And if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will be satisfied with having the ratification of nineteen States, the first eleven that would do it would be those which have just laid down their arms. This amendment would be hailed with a shout of joy in every rebellious Legislature. They would immediately set to work and reform their constitutions, excluding not only those of African descent from the polls, but also freemen who had continued on the side of the Union during the war. This amendment would be read with sorrow and regret throughout the world by all that sympathized with republican institutions, and if carried into practical effect it would be met with the loud indignation of our constituents, the scornful derision of our enemies, and the inextinguishable laughter of the friends of aristocracy and oligarchy among all the nations of the world.

Mr. LE BLOND obtained the floor.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I ask the gentleman to yield me the floor for a little while.

Mr. LE BLOND. I will.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I am exceedingly gratified at the disposition that has been manifested among the party in opposition here, by reason of their own differences of opinion, to allow an opportunity to us to present our objections to the measure now under consideration. This subject of amending the Constitution under which we have lived so long, so happily, and so prosperously, is one of great moment; and while I have some confidence in the ability and capacity of some of the friends on the opposite side to make a constitution, yet I prefer the Constitution as made by our fathers eighty years ago. And upon the question now before the House of amending that sacred instrument, I beg of the gentlemen to pause and reflect upon the consequences involved in this act upon the people in every section of this great country. Why urge through with such precipitate haste a matter affecting so greatly the people in this country now and hereafter, from ocean to ocean, from Maine to the Rio Grande?

Sir, this amendment is to operate for weal or for woe upon a people who have been lately in rebellion against the Constitution of the United States; who have no voice here to-day to plead for them, because their rights and privileges upon this floor are denied them. Would it not be well, would it not be in the spirit of harmony and concession, a spirit, too, that has to some extent characterized the action of parties before in power throughout this whole conflict, to wait before they pass this amendment until that people can be heard upon this floor?

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. TRIMBLE. For what purpose?

Mr. LYNCH. To ask a question.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Certainly.

Mr. LYNCH. I want to ask the gentleman, why do not the men he is speaking for have the privilege of being on this floor? Why are they not here now?

Mr. TRIMBLE. I will answer. They have the right, in my judgment, under the Constitution, to be here. Many of them are now about this Capitol with the broad seal of their States now in the hands of a committee of this House, giving them authority and power to take seats on this floor, as much as you and I or any one else; but they are kept out by the voice of this House.

Mr. LYNCH. The gentleman misapprehends my question. It is, by whose fault they are not here to-day.

Mr. TRIMBLE. By whose fault? Why, it is because the doors of this House are closed against them by the party in power.

Mr. LYNCH. Does it not go further back than that?

Mr. TRIMBLE. I do not propose to go farther back. [Laughter.] I hope the gentleman is satisfied.

Mr. LYNCH. I am.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Why, sir, do you keep Mr. Maynard out? Why do you keep Colonel Stokes out? Why do you keep out my distinguished friend, Mr. Cooper, and other gentlemen from Tennessee, whose loyalty no man in Tennessee has ever dared to question? I pause for a reply from the gentleman. He propounded a question to me, and I answered it. I now ask him, why do you keep these loyal men out?

Mr. LYNCH. What is the question?

Mr. TRIMBLE. The question is, why Mr. Maynard, Colonel Stokes, Governor Campbell, Colonel Cooper, Colonel Hawkins, and these other gentlemen who have been engaged in the cause of the Union, fighting the battles of the Union throughout the war, are kept from their seats upon this floor as Representatives from Tennessee?

Mr. LYNCH. Does the gentleman know why poor dog Tray suffered? [Laughter.]

Mr. TRIMBLE. Yes, sir; but I trust the gentleman does not intend by that remark to stigmatize these distinguished and gallant men by saying they were in bad company and must bear the consequences. They were fighting for the Union, and are entitled to the consideration of the House. They were in company with the President of the United States, and Colonel Hawkins was under fire at Charleston for sixty long days. That was very bad company!

Sir, I am opposed to this amendment, and to all kindred amendments, and I have no hesitancy in saying, upon this occasion, that I expect, while I remain true to myself and to the Constitution of my fathers, which I have so often sworn to support, to continue to oppose the submission of all such amendments to the people.

In my opinion, the amendment proposed is in violation of the reserved rights of the people of the States under that instrument. The object and purpose of this resolution is to enfranchise a million men in this country whom no political party in this country ever had the boldness to propose the enfranchisement of prior to the present session of Congress. I remember that in 1860 and 1861 the party known in this country as the Union party took the ground, from one end of the country to the other, that neither Congress nor the people of the States had the power, under the Constitution of the United States, to interfere with slavery in the States where it existed; much less, sir, did they claim the power not only to destroy it, but to strike down the provisions of the Constitution that protected me and my constituents in our right to our property. Sir, there was an amendment submitted then for the purpose of peace, for the purpose of restoring peace and quiet throughout the country. It met at the time my hearty support, and I regret from the bottom of my heart that the people, North, South, East, and West, did not agree to that proposition and make it part and parcel of the Constitution. I refer to the amendment proposed in 1861, declaring that Congress should never thereafter interfere with the question of slavery in the States.

Now, sir, what is the proposition presented here and to the country? Why do not gentlemen come out and state it boldly? Power is the impelling motive with these men, and all these propositions of amendment to the Constitution enfranchising the negroes look to the securing of power. They admit that it is an experiment; they admit that it has been heretofore untried, and they cannot say here or to the country what will be the result of the experiment. Why will you, my friends, upon a matter of so much importance, affecting your interests and my interests and the interests, I trust, of coming generations through all time—why will you imperil this Government, which has been the wonder and admiration of the world, by enfranchising these persons whom you have by your power and numbers made free, but whom you have by your own solemn acts declared incompetent to manage even matters of the smallest concern affecting themselves? Why, sir, we have a Freedmen's Bureau extending throughout this vast country, North and South, which shows that you regard these people as incompetent and unqualified to make even contracts for a few weeks' work! That bureau costs this Government about twelve million dollars annually. Sir, these gentlemen blow hot and cold in the same breath. When they want to establish negro suffrage in this District, they say that these people are freemen, and qualified to discharge the highest privileges of an American citizen; and the next moment, through their Freedmen's Bureau, they place these people, in my judgment, in a condition of slavery the most galling to them that they have ever felt. Sir, if they are free, withdraw your Freedmen's Bureau, and treat this unfortunate people like freemen—let them make their own contracts.

Sir, this proposition and all kindred propositions, in my judgment, are in direct opposition to the plain provisions of the Constitution itself, to the reserved rights of the States, which are sacred, and should be so regarded by Congress and the people. What are the principles upon which this Government has rested? Sir, this Government was formed by coequal States, who delegated to the General Government all the powers necessary and proper to secure the great end of protecting the general interests of the whole, reserving to the States all powers not delegated by the Constitution to the Federal Government. Why do I say this? Because it is the language of the Constitution itself. It declares that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Hence the powers not delegated to the Federal Government by the States still rest in the States, and there is no power on earth that can deprive the States of them. While I say that, I do not desire to be understood as defending the doctrine of secession.

While I desire to maintain the municipal sovereignty of the States, their inherent and exclusive right to regulate, order, and control their own domestic affairs, also the right to representation in Congress according to the Constitution, I have ever opposed the doctrine of secession.

When that doctrine was before the country I opposed it with all the power that I possessed, and I intend to be understood as yielding to the Federal Government every right and power delegated and necessary for her to protect the States and the people thereof respectively. Let her—the Federal Government—exercise the powers delegated and peculiar to her, the States all power not surrendered to the General Government by the Constitution. In that way there will be no question about which any State can make any complaint, or the rights of any citizen or State be invaded.

Had there been no violation of the spirit of the Constitution by the people of the North, in my judgment there never would have been a slaveholders' rebellion. But by the acts of those northern States, in the passage of personal liberty bills in violation of the Constitution, these men were enabled to seize on those unconstitutional acts as pretexts by which to fire the people of the South and precipitate them into rebellion; and well did they work upon their prejudices for that purpose. In my judgment, in 1860 and 1861, in some of the States of the South, that much-abused section of country, there was a large majority in favor of the Constitution and the Union; and if they could have been made to believe that their rights would have been secure under that Constitution, they could not have been drawn into revolution.

What were the issues presented in the South to the people in 1860 and 1861? Said the men who proposed to precipitate the people into revolution, "Will you stand here and act with the party in power, with an Administration selected upon a sectional issue, selected for the avowed purpose of destroying the South, and striking down our rights, not only in the Territories, but in the District of Columbia, in the navy-yards and the arsenals, and in the States themselves?" Maynard, and other men like him, stood up and said, "Gentlemen, the object and purpose of the party in power is to stand by the Constitution and by the rights of the people North and South." They repudiated this idea, and denied that these were the issues that were in question.

And what did Congress then say upon that subject? And how different are the acts of the majority here to-day from this resolution, which

I will read, expressing the will and pleasure of Congress in 1861:

"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States now in revolt against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress banishes all feelings of mere passion or resentment and will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged upon our part in any spirit of oppression nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

This was the declaration of the Congress of the United States; it was the declaration of every political party in this country up to the contest of 1864, when I believe there was a party met in convention in Cleveland, which proposed not to have anything to do with the then distinguished leader of the Republican party—the Chief Magistrate of the United States. They proposed at first to nominate a candidate upon the square issue of negro suffrage in the States. The convention that assembled in Baltimore, from caution or some other cause, did not put in their platform or present to the people any such issue; and so far as I know no political party in this country has ever gone before the people on any such issue.

You, my friends, here, were elected in the midst of the most terrific and gigantic civil strife that ever existed; you were elected without regard to this issue of negro suffrage at the dictation of Congress in the States, against the will of the people in such States; you were elected upon the idea of maintaining the Union and standing by the Constitution. And why is not this spirit exhibited here to-day? Why not pour oil upon the troubled waters and bring back these States with the rights and privileges under this Constitution of our fathers? Why keep them out while you legislate and make a Constitution for them? This matter of amending the Constitution is a very grave matter, even when all to be affected by it are represented, and it should be considered with calmness and with consideration. And the Representatives of the people, before they present this amendment, or any other amendment to the Constitution, for their consideration and ratification, should go before them and argue these propositions pro and con. And then let them return here after that deliberation and consideration, and present their views upon the subject. This is a grave question, and one which ought not to be entered upon without due consideration.

Now, sir, as I have intimated before, the party in power have changed front; they have changed entirely their tactics. They are to-day in revolution against the Constitution, ignoring, denouncing principles contained in their own acts in Congress, in their national and State conventions.

Where, I ask, will this system of amendment stop? Some eighty amendments are now pending in the two Houses of Congress. When and where will the party in power pause? Sir, a spectator coming into this House and observing the course of legislation would be led to suppose that there are no others than the blacks to be legislated for. It is they who claim exclusive attention. A large portion of the white citizens of this country, inhabiting the fairest portion of God's creation, are denied representation here, and no eloquent voice is raised in their behalf to-day; but the African has numberless champions to plead in favor of his right to vote in the States of the South at the will of Congress.

Sir, what was the position of the late President, Mr. Lincoln, who uttered the sentiment, "Charity toward all; malice toward none?" I read from his letter to Mr. Wood:

"Understanding the phrase in the paragraph above quoted, 'the southern States would send Representatives to the next Congress,' to be substantially the same as that 'the people of the southern States would cease resistance, and would reinaugurate, submit to, and maintain the national authority within the limits of such State under the Constitution of the United States,' I say that in such case the war would cease on the part of the United States, and that, if within a reasonable time a full and general amnesty were necessary to such end, it would not be withheld."

This is the language of the lamented chief of that party. Do they stand by that doctrine to-day? Do they stand by those principles? Or do they deny to these people representation, pouring upon them at the same time unmeasured denunciation, unlimited taxation, and seeking to force upon them negro suffrage? Is this the course of action that was to be expected of a great Government like this in the triumph of its power? Why cannot members of this House rise to the requirements of this great era, and so act as to win for the Constitution and Government of our fathers the support of every good man, woman, and child in this broad land, so that we may again witness the gladdening spectacle of a reunited and harmonious country, with the Constitution and laws as our shield and protection against usurpation, cruelty, and oppression, from dangers of every kind, from at home and abroad?

But that which seems at the present time to be pressing with greatest force upon the minds of many members of this House, is the fact that, by the action of the party in power, some three or four million persons hitherto slaves have been turned loose upon the South, and in consequence of their having become free the southern States are entitled to a larger number of Representatives on this floor than they formerly had. This is the difficulty which gentlemen here seem desirous to remedy by this amendment to the Constitution. Sir, it is a well-established principle that no one should be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong. If the party in power have succeeded in freeing the slaves of the South, ought they not at least to allow the southern States to enjoy the increased representation to which, according to the rule established by the Constitution, they are now entitled? Or if the northern States sincerely desire that the negroes of the South shall vote and shall be represented in Congress, let them transport those negroes to the North and take them under their guardianship. They are welcome to them.

I believe that the people of Kentucky, whom I in part represent, and I have no doubt the people of the whole South, will submit in good faith to the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. While they may believe that the amendment is revolutionary, and unjust, in violation of the rights of Kentucky and the South, still the southern States having in a way yielded up this question, for representation and peace, they will stand by the Constitution as amended. They will at the same time give to the negroes that protection to which they are entitled, protecting them in the enjoyment of their right to personal liberty and the enjoyment of the rewards of their own labor and industry. But we are asked to vote for this amendment, at the same time that we are to have in Kentucky a "Freedmen's Bureau," passing upon all questions between a white citizen and a negro, overriding the laws of our State, setting at defiance the decrees and judgments of our legal and constitutionally established courts. I regret I have not the last order issued there upon this subject, for I know it would startle my friend from Maine to have such orders executed by the bayonet in Maine.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said upon this floor, and again and again enunciated from one end of the country to the other by leading members of the now dominant party, that "the Union as it was," "the Constitution as it was," the condition of things which existed prior to this unfortunate war, should never, with their consent, be permitted to return. But, sir, as for myself, I would to God it were in my power to-day to restore that Constitution, giving to every man in this country his rights and privileges under it! Sir, if I had the power, I would restore to life the thousands and thousands who have gone from fields of battle to "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns." Sir, I would have a reunion of friends and of States. In my estimation, such a sentiment as this would not be unworthy of a patriot or a Christian; for the first I cannot in candor say so much.

Mr. Speaker, if I understand it, this proposition is a direct attack upon the President of the United States. It is a direct attack upon the doctrines and principles taught by that distinguished man now holding the presidential chair. This amendment is in violation, in my judgment, of every principle that that man has held from his boyhood up to the present hour. He said in his message of the 4th of December last—and I ask any friend of Andrew Johnson who believes he holds the sentiments he then expressed not to vote for the proposed amendment, when to do so you strike a stab at him; now, what does he say? After speaking of the rights and privileges under the Constitution, alluding to the fact that there were objections to his plan of reconstruction, alluding to the fact that it was suggested or required of him by proclamation to enfranchise the blacks in the southern States, he uses this language:

"On the propriety of attempting to make the freedmen electors by the proclamation of the Executive I took for my counsel the Constitution itself, the interpretations of that instrument by its authors and their contemporaries, and recent legislation by Congress. When, at the first movement toward independence, the Congress of the United States instructed the several States to institute governments of their own, they left each State to decide for itself the conditions for the enjoyment of the elective franchise. During the period of the Confederacy there continued to exist a very great diversity in the qualifications of electors in the several States; and even within a State a distinction of qualifications prevailed with regard to the officers who were to be chosen. The Constitution of the United States recognizes these diversities when it enjoins that in the choice of members of the House of Representatives of the United States 'the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.' After the formation of the Constitution it remained, as before, the uniform usage for each State to enlarge the body of its electors, according to its own judgment; and, under this system, one State after another has proceeded to increase the number of its electors, until now universal suffrage, or something very near it, is the general rule.

"So fixed was this reservation of power in the hands of the people, and so unquestioned has been the interpretation of the Constitution, that during the civil war the late President never harbored the purpose—certainly never avowed the purpose—of disregarding it; and in the acts of Congress during that period nothing can be found which, during the continuance of hostilities, much less after their close, would have sanctioned any departure by the Executive from a policy which has so uniformly obtained. Moreover, a concession of the elective franchise to the freedmen, by act of the President of the United States, must have been extended to all colored men, wherever found, and so must have established a change of suffrage in the northern, middle, and western States, not less than in the southern and southwestern. Such an act would have created a new class of voters, and would have been an assumption of power by the President which nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States would have warranted.

"On the other hand, every danger of conflict is avoided when the settlement of the question is referred to the several States. They can, each for itself, decide on the measure, and whether it is to be adopted at once and absolutely, or introduced gradually and with conditions. In my judgment the freedmen, if they show patience and manly virtues, will sooner obtain a participation in the elective franchise through the States than through the General Government, even if it had power to intervene. When the tumult of emotions that have been raised by the suddenness of the social change shall have subsided, it may prove that they will receive the kindest usage from some of those on whom they have heretofore most closely depended."

Sir, the President of the United States does not believe that the Congress of the United States has the right, or that the people have the right, to strike down the inalienable right of the States to settle for themselves who shall be clothed with that high privilege, suffrage. Now, while I say this much, I do not desire to be considered as defending the President of the United States. He needs no defense at my hands. I do not desire to be understood to say that I indorse all the acts of the Chief Magistrate in regard to the questions now agitating the public mind, but on the question of giving the southern States their rights of representation upon this floor, and the right to say who shall be voters in the States, I am with President Johnson, and will, so far as is in my power, give him a hearty and earnest support.

If he will stand by the Constitution, if he will stand by the rights of the States, he will meet with not only the support of gentlemen on that side of the House, but of eighteen hundred thousand Democratic voters in the North or adhering States who have not bowed the knee to power. They will stand by him in this hour of trouble and trial. I believe they will do it. I believe there are thousands of Republicans from one end of the country to the other who will stand by him to prevent consolidation and destruction of the States.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Yes sir.

Mr. THAYER. In case the President of the United States should sign this joint resolution, and it should pass both Houses of Congress, will the gentleman then stand by the President of the United States?

Mr. TRIMBLE. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." When Mr. Johnson shall sign the joint resolution I shall be prepared to answer. But I do not believe he will do it.

Mr. THAYER. That is not the question I asked. Would he stand by the President in that case? If he does not answer my question, very well.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I think I have answered the question. Wherever the President shall stand by the people and leave the question of the right of suffrage to the people of the States, I will stand by him. If he vetoes the measure, will the gentleman stand by him? I pause for a reply.

Mr. THAYER. I do not profess to be, as the gentleman's course would indicate to the House, the special champion of the President. Because the gentleman undertook to place himself in that position before the House, as the special champion of the President and as his shield against the party which has such a triumphant majority in this House, I asked him the question.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I renew my question: will you stand by the President?

Mr. THAYER. I will not stand by him on that question if he vetoes it. Certainly not.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I have already disclaimed being the defender of President Johnson, or to speak for him. I am not upon such terms as would warrant me in forming opinions or speaking from them. I form and express my opinions solely from his public and official declarations. I trust this is satisfactory.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman answer my question now as I answered his?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Well, sir, I am frank to say, if the President gives his approval to this measure, sir, I will not sustain him. [Laughter.] But I will sustain him in all matters where I believe he is standing by the rights of the people under the Constitution. Wherever he stands in favor of white men and white women, if you please, in opposition to negroes governing this country, I will stand by Andrew Johnson.

Mr. THAYER. I am glad the gentleman has answered the question, because his own answer and mine show, I think conclusively, that as regards the President we both stand in the same position toward him. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRIMBLE. Well, I stand by this position. I am frank to say that I opposed Mr. Johnson's election to the Vice Presidency, and supported another; but because I did that I have enough magnanimity and generosity in my heart, and I trust patriotism, that when President Johnson marches up, as I believe he will, in opposition to the behests of his own party, and stands by the people of the South, and the pledges he has made to them and to the country, I will stand by him, or any other man. Sir, he can interpose his veto power, and prevent these invasions of the Constitution and liberties of these people; and in doing so I will stand by him. I have no doubt that the gentlemen in the majority here have the power to put this amendment through. But, sir, when you have amended the Constitution, and it is ratified by three fourths of the States, it can never be recalled. You may never have an opportunity to undo what is done in this moment of triumph. Sir, the people of the South have shown themselves a fearless and brave people, to say the least of it. They have fought gallantly, and in a manner that entitles them to the respect of their conquerors. Then let us not put the South in irons, or make her another Ireland. Let us restore it to peace and honor. Let us gather together the fragments that are there left, build up her charred ruins, cultivate her rich soil, and, if possible, restore them to peace and prosperity and happiness, and receive these people back to the house of their fathers. Let us treat them, in all kindness, as equal States, and say to them, "Go, sin no more, but hereafter be true to the Union and the Constitution," remembering that it is human to err, divine to forgive.

Mr. LE BLOND resumed the floor.

USE OF THE HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the consent of the gentleman to present a resolution relating to the use of this Hall.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives be granted to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union League this evening and to-morrow (Wednesday) evening.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I objected to that resolution this morning, supposing it was for a political purpose. I now understand that it is not so, and therefore I have no objection to its adoption.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury of deposits of public money made by any State under the act of June 28, 1836, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 17, 1866; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. LE BLOND. It is very evident that there are a great many gentlemen who wish to debate this proposition; and in order to give an opportunity for amendment as well as discussion, I move that the joint resolution and pending amendments be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and that debate be restricted to thirty minutes, or I will say twenty minutes, as a matter of compromise on both sides.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] has the floor. Is there objection to this motion?

Mr. STEVENS. I object. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Ohio surrendered the floor?

Mr. LE BLOND. I surrender it for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will the gentlemen allow me to make the motion that I submitted at an early hour? I will then make a motion to adjourn. My motion is this: that the pending resolution and amendments be recommended to the committee on reconstruction, with instructions to report an amendment to the Constitution which shall, first, apportion direct taxes among the States according to property in each; and which shall, second, apportion representation among the States on the basis of adult male voters who may be citizens of the United States.

Mr. LE BLOND. I cannot give way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to surrender the floor to his colleague.

Mr. LE BLOND. No, sir; only for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I insist upon the motion I made to commit this to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if that motion is adopted it will go to the foot of the Calendar, and the Chair cannot tell when it will be reached.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. LE BLOND. I prefer that the motion be put to recommit.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House now adjourn, with these two pending questions, till to-morrow morning.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I ask the gentleman to yield one moment to allow me to make a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the resolution adopted by this House yesterday, offered by one of my colleagues, [Mr. McKee,] which I think reflects upon the judiciary of Kentucky. I do not believe the gentleman intended to do so, and therefore I desire to enter that motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and thirty minutes) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 24, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of discharged and disabled soldiers, who enlisted in the years 1861 and 1862, praying for an equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also presented the petition of H. H. Allen, praying compensation for goods sold to Captain Thomas Jordan, assistant quartermaster United States Army, when on duty in that capacity at Fort Dalles, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of citizens of the Territory of Colorado, now sojourning in the city of New York, in which they express the hope that the Territory of Colorado, to which they belong, may speedily be admitted into the Union, but with a proviso—"provided that she shall be assured a republican form of government now and for all time to come;" and whatever other measures Congress may adopt to that end, they most earnestly and respectfully ask that the word "white" be expunged from her constitution wherever it may occur before she be permitted to count herself among and become one of the sisters of this great and most glorious Republic. As the bill for the admission of the Territory of Colorado is already on the table in the Senate, I move that this petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Detroit, Michigan, praying for the improvement of the St. Clair flats and the enlargement of the Canadian canals by means of a treaty with Great Britain for that object; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, residents of the collection district of Detroit, praying that that district may be divided into two collection districts, and that the principal office of the new district may be located at Port Huron, on the St. Clair river, opposite the terminus of the Grand Trunk and Great Western railways in Canada; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the common council of Port Huron, Michigan, praying for the sale of so much of the military reservation at Fort Gratiot, in that State, as may not be required for actual military purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. BROWN. I present a petition of certain colored citizens of Denver, in the Territory of Colorado, showing "that the State constitution, framed by a citizens' convention, and adopted by an almost insignificant majority of the legal voters of Colorado, preparatory to admission as a State, excludes all colored citizens of the Territory of Colorado from the right of suffrage by the incorporation in that instrument of the words 'all white male citizens.'" The petitioners, therefore, "beseech your honorable body not to admit the Territory as a State until the word 'white' be erased from her constitution." I ask that this petition may take the same course with the petition which was just presented by the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to the State of Colorado, and lie upon the table.

It was so ordered.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I present a petition for universal suffrage signed by some of the most intelligent and accomplished women of our land, asking an amendment of the Constitution of the United States that shall prohibit the several States from disfranchising any of their citizens on the ground of sex.

The petition sets forth that the Constitution classes them as "free people" and counts them as "whole" persons in the basis of representation, and yet that they are governed without their consent, taxed without appeal, and punished without choice of judge or jury. Therefore, as Congress has now before it amendments to the Constitution in harmony with advancing civilization, placing new safeguards round the individual rights of four million emancipated slaves, they ask you "to extend the right of suffrage to women, the only remaining class of disfranchised citizens, and thus fulfill the constitutional obligation to guaranty to every State a republican form of government."

Justice and equality is what they pray for, and as the only sure protection for that they demand the ballot.

One other word I perhaps ought to say in presenting this petition; it is that they, the women of the land, who have shared so many of the hardships of this war, and shed such radiance of Christian charity over the wrecks it has wrought, have, so far as they are moved to make this demand for equal suffrage, been content to hold their claim in abeyance, that the nation might establish the principle of freedom in the person of the slave. But having done so, they fear now that the same constitutional amendment which may carry civil rights to the emancipated classes may prohibit those rights, either directly or by implication, to women. They deprecate any such action or thought, and in view of it they feel no longer content to remain silent. They believe in the rightfulness of their demand; and so believing, they appeal to the reason, no less than the sympathy, of the Congress of the United States to take heed that at least nothing prejudicial to their claim shall go upon the record.

I move the reference of this petition to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I rise to present a paper, in the form of a memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives, upon a very important subject, and, as I desire that the committee on reconstruction should give it their particular attention, I will read it as it is very short. In presenting it I wish it distinctly understood that I do not desire to invade the exclusive domain of any Senator upon this floor. The memorial is in these words:

"The undersigned, inhabitants of Appoquinimink hundred, in the State of Delaware, respectfully but earnestly entreat your honorable body to adopt such a proposed amendment of the United States Constitution, to be presented to the several States for ratification, as will forever prevent every State from making any distinction in civil rights and privileges among the naturalized citizens of the United States residing within its limits, or among persons born on its soil, on account of race, color, or descent."

As there are a few car-marks upon this petition, which show the manner in which they are gotten up, I beg leave to read them—it will take but a moment:

"Postmasters and others receiving copies of the blanks will do the cause a good service by placing them in such hands as will canvass their neighborhoods for signers, in case they cannot give proper attention to the matter themselves."

"The above blanks should be attached to the required number of half sheets of paper, and may be signed by persons of both sexes. When filled one copy may be sent to any member of the Senate."

I suppose that is the reason this has been sent to me—

"and the other to the member from the petitioner's district in the House, both postage free. Extra copies of these blanks may be had at the Anti-Slavery office, No. 5 South Fifth street, Philadelphia."

To the bottom of the petition is attached the following:

"I have offered this for signers and no one will sign, so you may set it down we have no negro men here."

I move to refer this paper to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of loyal citizens of Loudoun county, Virginia, praying for compensation for property destroyed by fire, and for live stock taken for the use of the Army or sold for the benefit of the United States by order of General Sheridan. The petitioners represent that they are, and always have been, loyal citizens attached to the Government, subjecting their persons and property to peril on that account, and conceive themselves entitled to protection. I move its reference to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Rebecca Irwin, widow of Archibald Irwin, late a private in battery C, first regiment of Rhode Island light artillery, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of Edward St. Clair Clarke, an acting assistant paymaster in the United States Navy, praying to be relieved from all responsibility in consequence of money lost by robbery in May, 1863, while he was attached to the United States steamer Sumter, then lying at the navy-yard at Brooklyn, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. NYE presented the memorial of Frederick Vincent, administrator of James Le Caze, late of the firm of Le Caze & Mallett, praying for the payment of a balance alleged to be due for advances made by them to the Government during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of Mrs. Maria L. Saunders, praying for indemnification for losses alleged to have been sustained by her in the destruction of her property in Paducah, Kentucky, by United States soldiers under the order of Colonel Stephen G. Hicks, on the 26th of March, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL presented the memorial of G. Buckingham, S. J. Bowen, and B. H. Nadel, the executive committee of the National Freedmen's Relief Association of the District of Columbia, praying for an appropriation for the relief of refugees commonly called "contrabands," and that authority be given to the Secretary of War to place under the control of the Freedmen's Bureau such Government buildings as are not required for the public service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the credentials of my colleague-elect, Hon. SAMUEL J. KIRKWOOD, be taken from the table and read.

The credentials of Mr. Kirkwood, elected by the Legislature of Iowa a Senator for the unexpired term of Mr. Harlan, ending March 3, 1867, were read.

Mr. GRIMES. My colleague is now present and prepared to take the oaths of office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will come forward and take the oaths.

Mr. Kirkwood advanced to the desk, and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to him he took his seat in the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, it was Ordered, That the petition of Charles Murray, a paymaster in the United States Navy, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FOOT. Yesterday an order was made for the withdrawal of the petition and other papers in the case of Jonathan Ball, for the extension of his patent. I now move that the petition and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the petitions of Kennedy O'Brien and John A. McTavish, reported adversely thereon; and the report was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Alton Nelson, praying for an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a memorial of the faculty and students of the medical department of Georgetown college, in the District of Columbia, praying that the same facilities may be furnished to the medical colleges in the District of Columbia for procuring bodies for dissection that are now furnished by the laws of the several States, submitted an adverse report thereon, the committee deeming any legislation on the subject to be inexpedient.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 43) to prescribe the mode of settling the accounts of the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 64) to incorporate the Great Falls Ice Company of Washington, District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 83) in relation to the Court of Claims, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred resolutions of the convention of the State of North Carolina in favor of the repeal of the act of July 2, 1862, requiring the test oath therein mentioned, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient at this time to repeal the act of July 2, 1862, prescribing an oath of office.

The resolution lies over for consideration.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 94) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of seamen and others borne on the books of vessels wrecked or lost in the naval service," approved July 4, 1864, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred petitions of the officers of the United States steamers Key West, Tawah, and Elfin, and of the officers of the iron-clad steamer Patapsco, praying remuneration for losses sustained by them in the destruction of those vessels, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 86) quieting doubts in relation to the validity of certain locations of lands in the State of Missouri, made by virtue of certificates issued under the act of Congress of February 17, 1815, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 24) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed. The proposed amendment is as follows:

ARTICLE —. No payment shall ever be made by the United States or any State for or on account of the emancipation of any slave or slaves, or for or on account of any debt contracted or incurred in aid of rebellion against the national Government.

SOUTHERN CONFISCATION.

Mr. DIXON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation is necessary for the protection of loyal citizens of the United States whose property, real or personal, has been confiscated by the so-called confederate government, and for the restoration of such property to the loyal owners thereof, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

ASSOCIATED PRESS REPORTS.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I rise to say a few words upon a question of privilege. Yesterday morning I had the honor to be the medium of presentation to the Senate of a memorial from a very large and popular convention of miners held at the capital of the State of California relating to the disposition of the mineral lands. I find in the report of the Associated Press this morning of the proceedings of the Senate yesterday, that it is stated that I presented a memorial from the Legislature of the State of California. I desire to correct that statement. It will also be remembered by the Senate that some remarks were made on the subject by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and myself. The substance of what was stated by the honorable Senator from Ohio is clearly reported in the Associated Press reports, but no word in behalf of the memorialists is reported as spoken by myself. As a matter of course, so far as this subject can find its way to my constituents who are distant from this place, it will appear that they had no voice in their behalf on the presentation of their requests to this body.

Mr. President, I would not call the attention of the Senate to this matter, or delay it in its legitimate proceedings this morning for this particular case, nor for what is involved in it personal to myself, were it not that I am convinced that it has become a public duty to do so. I state further to the Senate, that a week since, or thereabouts, I presented two memorials of interest to the citizens of the State of California, whom I in part represent here, which were studiously suppressed by the reporters of the Associated Press in the gallery of the Senate, not a word being said in regard to them. Two days since I had the honor of presenting two bills in this body, one for the construction of a railroad from the waters of the bay of San Francisco to Humboldt bay, in the northern part of the State of California, a subject of considerable consequence there if not here; and the other, a measure of great consequence to the people of San Francisco, proposing to quiet the title to lands in that city, which were also suppressed. I am now entering upon the second year of service in this body, and since I have been a member of the Senate, all or nearly all of the business that I have attempted to do for the people who so generously sent me here has been regularly suppressed by the reporters of the Associated Press.

I would not make this statement so emphatically but that it has come to my knowledge that one of these reporters not only treats in this manner me, and all the business which I do here, and thus my constituents through me, but he has also made it a business to avail himself of his place, as a correspondent of a Cincinnati journal, to make attacks, personal and vituperative, on myself, certainly without cause or provocation, evidently for the purpose of republication in the State of California.

It has also come to my knowledge that I am not the only Senator whom that reporter employed by the Associated Press has undertaken to determine the status of in this body, the highest legislative body in the nation. If the Senate of the United States, or the Senators composing this august body, are not entitled to have a fair transcript of their proceedings sent out to the people at large, then, sir, I must say, for one, that their rights and privileges are very limited indeed.

When I state in addition that this reporter, who has made himself so obnoxious in this regard in the performance of a public duty, is an employé of the Senate, and, as I understand, paid from the Treasury of the United States, performing the duties of a committee clerk in addition to those of reporter for the Associated Press, I believe I also state a fact of some importance to the body and to the country.

I make these statements at this time particularly, not only in my own behalf, but in behalf of the position of a Senator, and in behalf of other Senators also, so that the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Library, to whom the subject of the synoptical reports that shall go out from this body to the country has been referred, and who have it under consideration, may devise some remedy, if possible. I have been aware for a long time that outside parties have had access, not certainly with the knowledge of the respectable association called the Associated Press, and known as such, but with parties connected with it, by which these suppressions were regularly and systematically carried on. I desire to direct the attention of the Senate and the country to this subject, without any hope, however, that what I say, or even the substance of it, will be sent out by the reporter of whom I have spoken; but with the hope that the attention of the Senate may be directed to the subject, so that such a synopsis of the proceedings of this body shall go out to the country as will be a true reflex of its public proceedings.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask leave to say a single word upon the subject that has been referred to by the honorable Senator from California. I am sorry that he has deigned to notice any such matter. Ever since I have been a member of the Senate, the filthy vermin that crawl over the abolition sheets have been burrowing in the committee-rooms of the Senate, and receiving pay and subsistence from the Treasury of the United States. Their principal business is to send out their libels upon Senators. They do very little work. A single industrious man might perform the labor of half a dozen of them in the committee-rooms and as clerks of the committees. I do not pay any attention to these effusions. I do not read them. I have not time to express my contempt and my indifference for the libelous writers and for their writings, and I am very sorry that the honorable Senator from California deigned to pay them the least attention.

Mr. McDUGALL. I might claim the right to make the same question of privilege that my colleague has made, and I might have antedated the occasion for it. It seems, however, that the newspapers do not affirm of him anything that he has not done. The fact that they omit saying what he has done will leave him in a better condition than most of his compeers upon this floor. [Laughter.] I, a long time since, then being a member of this body, learned through the newspapers, upon excellent authority, at an early period of this war, that I had gone in a steamer from Cairo down to Columbus, then in possession of the enemy, and that I had there met a certain Benjamin F. Cheatham, a general of the confederate army, and that I had gone with him ashore to Columbus, and had remained there some ten days, and had exposed to him the whole policy of General Grant, then occupying a position at Cairo, our advanced front toward the Southwest. All this was very carefully stated on "very good authority," in a leading press in a part of the country from which my colleague and myself come. It was simply saying something of me that did not happen. I had the honor to escort an elegant lady down there on the flag-of-truce boat, and met in the middle of the stream the vessel from the other side on which she went South. This was the foundation for the story. If the newspapers do not say anything about me that is not true, they may forget me forever. When ignorance is bliss, it is sometimes folly to be wise.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that I ought to say anything in regard to this matter; and probably I should not do so but for the fact that the reporter referred to is clerk to a committee of which I am a member. He was a clerk a long time before he was employed by the Associated Press to send their dispatches as to the proceedings of this body. I regret myself his employment as a reporter of the Associated Press; but, like most of the clerks of committees, he had the leisure, the opportunity, the time, and the ability to make reports for the Associated Press. He was employed for that purpose. There was nothing inconsistent in this employment with the legitimate performance of his duty as clerk to a committee; and indeed it is a fact known to us all that very many of the gentlemen connected with the press throughout the country in different States are employed here in various capacities in connection with our committees, and with offices in the Departments. It has never been held as an objection.

Now, as to the particular complaints that have been made by Senators against the reporter of the Associated Press I can say nothing. I must confess that I care but very little what the papers report of me, and do not pay much attention to them. If injustice has been done to the Senator from California, it is a proper subject of complaint. I thought when the subject was referred to the Committee on the Library, that they would devise some mode by which a legitimate and fair report of our proceedings could be written out for the Associated Press. But it must be remembered that the Associated Press are at liberty to report just what they please. We do not pay them for their reports. They are not our agents; they are not employed by us. They have the right to report just as much and just as little of our proceedings as they choose. Sometimes they may do injustice to Senators. How can we prevent it? Unless you say that nobody shall sit in the gallery and report the proceedings of this body, unless it is some person paid by us and under our surveillance, as a matter of course they are at liberty to report as much or as little as they choose. You cannot control the action of the press. I have felt within the last three or four weeks a little sore about the conduct of certain newspapers, but I have found it wiser to say nothing about it, with the hope and with the assurance that the people always finally correct any neglects or misapprehensions of the press. I think that if the Senate should undertake to correct the mode and manner of reporting for the Associated Press, they will undertake that which they cannot accomplish. The better way, it seems to me, is to allow the reporters to write what they please; do as they please.

If the Senate think, as a rule, that no one in the employment of any committee of this body or of Congress, or of any Department of the Government, should write for the newspaper press, they ought to put that in the form of a law or resolution, so that we could all know how to act. I will venture to say that there are but very few clerks of the committees of either House of Congress that do not write for newspapers. If you desire, however, to prevent your clerks and employes from writing for newspapers, you have the power to do that at any moment by a simple resolution; but you cannot control, and you ought not to attempt to control, the reports made by the Associated Press or by any newspaper in the country of the proceedings in Congress.

Mr. STEWART. I did not intend to make any remarks on this subject, and I should not but for the suggestions made by the Senator from Ohio.

It is manifest to a large number of the Senators on this floor that there is something very wrong in the reports of our proceedings in this Associated Press. That there is no remedy for it I do not believe. I do not intend to say that the Senate should muzzle the press; but the Senate does extend to the reporters front seats in the gallery, and there is no Senator upon this floor who does not know the fact that much injustice is done in these reports to a large number of the Senators. There appears to be a systematic attempt to smother all that a portion of them do and say. This is entirely different from ordinary newspaper abuse; that affects no man who has a good character and behaves himself; but this purports to be a synopsis of the proceedings of Congress, and the silence of Senators here is marked by their constituents.

I must here state that while I was in California I heard the Senators from that State complained of for not doing their duty in regard to certain matters, not saying anything in favor of propositions which they had ably advocated on this floor. The arguments against them, what was said against their views, were sent there by telegraph, and they were represented as being silent. I know that gentlemen have suffered in this regard. If we cannot do better, we should make it known to the world that these are not authentic reports. If we can do nothing more, we can pass a resolution declaring that they misrepresent the Senate. Or we can exclude the reporters from the front seats in the galleries, and we can exclude them from our committees as clerks. We can take such action as shall secure the doing of justice to the members of the Senate, for I do assure you that great injustice has been done. A gentleman gets up with a memorial in which his constituents feel an especial interest; he explains that memorial; it is attacked by others. The attack is given, but the explanation is kept back; and still we hold out to the world that here is a telegraphic synopsis of the proceedings of Congress; it goes semi-officially. If we cannot correct it and make it fair and just, we have the power to destroy its semi-official character by a resolution; and unless there is a manifest improvement, I shall feel called upon to ask the attention of the Senate to this subject again and again, and continue to do it, because I do not propose to have anything go forth that is semi-official which places me or any of my associates upon this floor in a false position daily, and makes their constituents believe that they are recreant to their duty.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg the attention of the Senate only for a moment, because of what has been said by the honorable Senator from Ohio. I beg the Senate and that honorable Senator to believe that I feel perhaps quite as independent as I ought to feel of any remarks either for or against me that may be made by the public press, or by any person. I think in that respect I have an ordinary amount of personal discretion and courage, if I may use the terms. I directed what I said, from which it might be inferred that I had any feeling of that kind, only to the matter of a more full exposition of the question. What I complain of is that the synoptical reports that go out from this body, which are the only reports received by the people, should, in justice to the Senate and the people, contain what they profess to do—a true synopsis of the business of the Senate. I know that that does not include the arguments of Senators. The business of the Senate is one thing as stated in the Journal; the arguments elicited in connection with the transactions of that business are altogether another matter. I cannot expect the Associated Press or anybody else to give a full exposition of whatever views I might present at any time, and I make no complaint because that is not done; but, in regard to such a proposition as was submitted here yesterday, it is stated in this synoptical report that the honorable Senator from Ohio said, and for uttering it I give him great credit, that the complaints made, and the manner in which they were made in the memorial I presented, were not well founded; his side of the case is given, when not a word is stated as coming from me in behalf of the memorialists, my constituents. That is the way it goes out in these synoptical reports.

Now, I submit to the honorable Senator from Ohio, who can afford to pass this by easily, whether this is just, whether it is right, and whether its correction does not properly come within the legitimate purview of the Senate. Then, I called attention additionally to the fact that I presented two other memorials a few days since, no reference to which ever appeared in the synoptical reports that went out to the country; and that I presented two bills of the greatest consequence to the people that I represent here within two days past, not a word in regard to which has gone out in the synoptical reports of the proceedings of this body.

Sir, I am not here as a candidate for public favor; I ask no favors from the Associated Press, nor any other part of the press, but I submit to the Senate and to the honorable Senator from Ohio that we here are peers of each other, that the States and communities who have sent us here are entitled to consideration, that this should not be viewed in the light of personal complaint, but that every Senator is equally interested in having a true reflex of the business of this body go out to the country and to the people.

Mr. HOWE. As chairman of the Committee on the Library, I have been directly referred to in this debate. I know a resolution was referred to that committee directing them to make some inquiry into the subject-matter of this abuse and to provide a remedy if it were possible. The committee have not yet sufficiently considered that subject. The committee have not, either, been wholly inattentive to the subject-matter of the resolution. The first difficulty in the way of applying a corrective—for I think a corrective is entirely within the reach of the Senate—is in ascertaining who is responsible, who makes these reports for the Associated Press. That fact has not been known to me hitherto. The Senator from Ohio has just remarked that the same individual is also a clerk to his committee. If he is authorized to give his name to the Committee on the Library, there is one fact ascertained. If he does not feel authorized to give that name—

Mr. SHERMAN. The matter is published in the Congressional Directory. The name of the reporter of the Associated Press I understand to be Mr. McCullough. It is published in the Congressional Directory; so I suppose there is no secret about it.

Mr. HOWE. Then that fact is ascertained. I was not informed that the name of the reporter did appear in the Directory; I had not examined it for that purpose. I think, then, there will be no difficulty in devising a remedy. I agree also with the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from California entirely, that these reports are unlike the private dispatches which are sent to the individual papers. The press, representing both parties and all parties, associate together, as I understand, to get a transcript of what is actually done in these Houses from day to day. They want a truthful report; they do not expect to obtain a full transcript of the debates had here. I suppose it is optional with them whether they will take much or little of these debates; but what is done should be, if reported at all, truthfully reported; and I suppose it is entirely within the power of the Senate to say that whoever undertakes to do it and does not do it faithfully and truly and honestly, shall not have a seat in the reporters' gallery. This is all I wish to say at present on the subject.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, the pending question being on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out all of the fifth section of the bill after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That the possessory titles granted in pursuance of Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed and made valid.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possessions for the period of three years from the date of said order; and no person shall be disturbed in or ousted from said possession during said three years, unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant by the owner, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, I stated yesterday that I objected to the amendment now pending as well as the terms of the original provision of section five of the bill, and I rested the objection upon strictly constitutional grounds. I stated that, however during the pendency of the conflict we might wink at questionable exercises of authority, now, peace having been restored, there being no longer the sound of arms, I thought the Constitution of the United States had the right to be recognized in its full force and with all its vitality, and that no palpable invasion of the Constitution, no matter how insignificant in its operations or in its dimensions, was now admissible.

I know the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to be a good and astute constitutional lawyer. Probably no one in this Senate Chamber is his master in all the considerations that hem in and circle about and illuminate the face of that great instrument. I know, too, that when he undertakes to legislate the property of a citizen into the possession of a stranger, he goes without the authority of the Constitution, beyond the grant made to the Federal Government by the people of the United States, whether, as in the original bill, it is proposed to give simply what is called a possessory right, or whether, as in the amendment, it be a possession for two years. I took occasion to remark yesterday, whether the Senator heard it or not, that the term possessory title is known to our laws. All the aboriginal titles as recognized by us are possessory titles. We recognize even the wild Indians as having a possessory title before we make a treaty with them, and we do not take possession of their lands until we have treaties with them, and then the titles they hold under us afterward are possessory titles. All the northwestern Indians had possessory titles, and the titles of the Indians of New York are possessory titles. What is a possessory title? It is a right to remain on and occupy the soil without being invested with the fee simple.

It is now proposed that Congress shall grant a two-years' possessory title. That is, in substance, a warrant on the part of the Federal Government that these persons, having no right to the soil as against those who have the right, may maintain the possession for two years, or until Congress shall further legislate. From whence does Congress derive this power? Do we understand, or do we not, that our powers are derivative; that we have no original power? The people of the United States, conceded to this Federal Government certain powers which it may exercise within the limits of the concession, and not beyond it; and nowhere in the Constitution is there a word that confers upon the Federal Government, or upon any branch of it, legislative, executive, or judicial, the power to authorize A, be he white or be he black, to occupy the possession or the right of B. We ought not now, when we should be calm, when we may be expected to judge wisely, to do anything to impinge upon the patent by which we hold our place here, and by which this Government stands—the patent from the people of the Republic.

But what does this amount to practically? The Senator from Illinois will admit that the Government has not this power, unless he says we have the power to override the Constitution and go beyond our charter. You may say that we ought to protect these persons; but how? General Sherman was altogether right; his order was altogether right. He was in military possession. It was in time of war. He had these people in charge; it was his military duty to see that they were taken care of; he gave them a temporary home. They were covered by his power as long as the law of arms prevailed.

Does the law of arms prevail now throughout the South? Does grim-visaged war still continue to present his wrinkled front throughout one half of our Confederacy? I am told officially, for I have been a careful inquirer, that peace reigns throughout the South. That there are instances of individual wrong is not to be doubted. Ever since the first blood was shed by the son of our great parent wrong has been rife throughout the world. That there may be an Almighty God, there has to be challenged from the abyss an evil spirit which sometimes prevails; but when necessity demands it, from the great throne he is made to obey the great governing law of order instituted and maintained by the Master supreme. We must ourselves recognize such governing considerations. We must hesitate before we depart from the law which with us is as organic and which we are as much bound to obey as we are those compelling forces, the great laws of nature, those laws that hurl the spheres and to which the sun itself is obedient.

I have said that it is time that we come back and examine exactly what our powers are and our rights. We have exerted power; we have driven the Indian from his possessory rights. New England drove the Narragansetts and the Pequods, and South and North Carolina drove the Creeks and the Cherokees. All the remnants of the Indian tribes now mostly live beyond the great river of the West. That has been done by the right of power. We have never recognized any particular right in the people of the race of Logan and Red Jacket and Tecumseh, chiefs, warriors, and conquerors of as great a race as is now being dignified by the eloquence of the Senator from Massachusetts and his associates. While we dispossessed them, and told them to go west, and go west again toward the setting sun, we admitted no title in them, because when they declined to sign the treaties they were driven by force. It is proposed now by the terms of this law to clothe parties in possession with a possessory right for two years more. And how? By a person appointed for the purpose, not belonging to the judiciary of the United States, not known to our Constitution, not known to our previous system—a person named by the Executive, who is to maintain his authority and power, not by a marshal, not by a sheriff with a posse, but to maintain his authority by armed force. That is to say, we are to have a judiciary independent of the law, with an army to support it, and with power to hold and keep property that may be claimed in the courts of the United States, and may be there adjudged to a citizen of the United States as being his right, and that right may be withheld by the voice of one of these appointees, not known to our system, and against the posse which by the rules of the common law could be called to the aid of any person holding a judicial office to carry out his judgments. The proposition, then, is to provide a military force to meet and contend with the civil power of the Government. This may be a simple thing apparently; we have been in the habit in the Senate of looking at such large propositions that this may seem trifling; but let me say that it is in many respects a bold invasion of fundamental law. It is the organization of a judiciary to be maintained against the common judiciary of the country, by armed force. It is a provision for maintaining a standing army throughout a great part of the United States, in aid of persons who shall pronounce civil judgments, and to maintain them against the judgments of the courts known to the Constitution, and known to long-established law. It may be wise to do these things, but they did not belong to the wisdom of our fathers, and I do not think any great revelation has come from on high and breathed the truths of such proceedings into the mind or heart of the persons who project these propositions.

We, in my judgment, do not need this bill. The people of mixed blood or of African descent in the South are free as far as the law can pronounce them free. The provision of the constitutional amendment, now a part of the instrument, authorizes Congress to pass any law in aid of its terms. What would be a law in aid of it? A just and proper law in aid of it would be a law declaring that no State legislation or legislation of Congress should be effective to deprive any person, regardless of color, of his right to life, liberty, and the pursuit and enjoyment of happiness; that every person shall be free, and that he shall be protected, if you please.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] told us a day or two ago what freedom meant; and he said it meant protection. Ay, sir, it does mean protection. Under all Governments that are free, freedom is perfect protection in life, liberty, and the enjoyment and pursuit of happiness. Have we not by our Constitution provided that these persons shall be free, and have the right to enjoy liberty and happiness; and have we not the power to pass a law that no disabling act heretofore enacted shall be executed or operate in any State of this Union? Certainly. What results? The negro of the South has the same privilege that I have to go to work and earn his living, to do it by his wit or do it by his hands. Thousands of white boys in the North with difficulty get clothing enough to warm them in the hyperborean regions. Many of them have hardly sufficient covering to protect them properly on their way to the country school; and they have to fight their way in the world. Millions have to fight and have fought their way in this country; and cannot the negro do it? Many people come to our shores from foreign lands with simply the means to deliver themselves at our ports. Do we take care of them? Not at all. If the negro, being made free, cannot take care of himself, how long shall we be his guardians, and take more care of him than we do of the poor boys of our own race and people? And then—I beg to throw this in by way of parenthesis—although they are not able to take care of themselves, and we have got to throw a protecting shield over them, and make a special set of courts for them, and maintain a standing army for their protection, they are to be regarded as altogether qualified to vote as to who shall administer the Government from which they claim most abject protection.

The bill has another cardinal vice, and as I am on the floor I may as well state it now. It is a vice which belongs to our Republic, and the Republic will at some time be overthrown if this vice be not eradicated. It was said by the wisest philosopher of France, as I think, of the present age, in discussing the sociology of all systems of Government from the family up to great nations, that the vice of republics was their tendency to increase offices. An office must be made for every man who is smart enough to be valuable to some other person who has got power, and for every office there are fifty aspirants. The people of a republican Government, from their childhood up to mature years, are thinking, some "Can I not be a constable?" some "Can I not be an alderman?" others, "Can I not be a lawyer?" or "Can I not be a judge?" others, "Can I not be a Governor?" and the most aspiring, "Can I not be President of the United States?" The attention of the people in a republican form of government is all the time directed to ascending by virtue of office instead of by cultivation achieving those results that truly elevate humanity. That force has been at work in this Republic until it has demoralized it; and never has it been more actively at work than it has been for the last five years.

Our city of Washington is filled with officials who have new duties to perform; offices had to be made for them. As has been said a hundred times here, you may go to any of the Departments in this city, with perhaps a single exception during the late war, and walk through during business hours, and you will not find one clerk in five who has any business to do except smoke a cigar and enjoy conversation with his friends. I do not know the experience of others, but I know that I learned to work from early in the morning until sometimes late at night. In my younger days it was my duty to do so, and I did it. I worked three times as long as any of these clerks do. Unless there be some special exceptions, they are not called upon for more than a few short hours of daily service here, and during those hours most of them have not work to do. What is true of them is true of the officers of the country generally. You can hardly find a State where there are not twenty judicial districts, each supporting a judge, a district attorney, and all the retinue of officers to administer justice. I have seen the time when a single judge would dispatch the business of a circuit as large as six or seven of the modern districts. The same thing is true in regard to other officers, not only in the Federal and State governments, but it has extended to the counties and cities and towns. This bill proposes to make a large mass of new offices, and how long are they to continue? Until the States which have been in rebellion are recognized. How recognized? Recognized they have been by the President. They have their States organized; they have their Senators and members of Congress elected; their credentials have been presented here under the seals of their respective States, as well authenticated as ever were certificates brought into the Senate Chamber; but yet they are not allowed to enter upon this floor, they are not allowed to enter upon the floor of the House of Representatives; they are not recognized by us. In their absence, it is said, we must legislate about them, although we deny them entrance here.

And what does the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER?] He made a speech at the last session to stave off the question of the recognition of Senators who then presented themselves from Louisiana. He avowed that he was making a stave-off fight; that they should not be allowed to come in here; that the question should not be settled. This is a stave-off fight now, not that they do not come here with the muniments of right, as much so as he ever brought to the Senate Chamber; but it will not do to let them in; we must legislate for them in their absence, they having a right to be here; and the question is now practically whether there is a majority of the Federal Senate that will maintain this war or not to force action in the absence of those who have a right to be here, but who are excluded that conclusions may be reached suiting the special interests of New England, or, if you please, the interests of Massachusetts—no, I will not say that, but the ideas of one of the representative men of Massachusetts who occupies a place upon this floor.

It is, I say, proscription, and proscription of the worst kind. I never can think of it without carrying my mind back to the time when men who fled from the tyranny of Europe made themselves tyrants at home. I cannot reflect on it without thinking of that old man who said "thee" and "thou," who came to the neighborhood of Plymouth rock for refuge and was compelled to fly. Ay, sir, the fathers of the "liberal" gentlemen from that part of the world would not allow him to stay in the wigwag of the Indian, and drove him out in the pitiless winter day to find his way to more friendly tribes beyond the strength of Massachusetts, and take shelter with the Indians of Rhode Island. That same love of domination which is peculiar to the race, exists here; and now six States, with twelve Senators, representing no greater population than some one of our States, undertake, while they have their hour of power, to enjoy it most luxuriously.

I have not much objection to that, because power may make drunk, and it has inebriated some of the greatest and wisest men of the world, and I think that under the influence of the power they have possessed, and which they are exerting now in this very proposition, they are reeling in their saddles; and let me tell them that that party which they characterize as their ancient adversary yet lives and is a power, and will be, as long as thought is free and men have the privilege of action. That party which believes that the Federal Government is a concession by the people of the United States, with powers limited by the concession; that party which believes that the State governments are clothed with all sovereign power except that which has been given to the Federal Government, and except so far as they are restricted by their State constitutions, and that beyond and above them all the people are sovereign, for they made the States, and with the same sovereign will that they made this Republic, and each in its sphere is equally supreme; the party which maintains that the difference between the charter of the Federal Government and that of the State governments is, that the State constitutions are limitations of power, because in the State governments the people are supposed to act most directly; the party that maintains that distinction and adheres to the Constitution and the laws as laid down and established fundamentally is a party that will live.

And, sir, it is a party that recognizes the party of the age. Gentlemen here who have discussed this question seem to think that all progress has been centralized in the question of the condition of servitude in the South. How does it happen that the Democratic party of the North ever had any relation to the majority of the South? For this reason: because the Democratic party of the North held to the doctrine of free trade. The Democratic party to-day hold the same doctrine. They do not believe that New England with her manufactories should overwhelm the Republic, that every interest besides hers should be taxed to maintain her. They believe in the large policy which has been developed by modern European and American civilization, which has been taught by all great writers, and preached by all great thinkers for the last half century. The Democratic party will maintain that doctrine; they have always done so, and therefore they were akin to the South; and for no other reason. It was because they always opposed the excessive taxation which was thought necessary to make millionaires of all New England. New England has to-day one half of the moneyed wealth of the Union, I grant. How has it come about? It has taxed every bushel of corn and every pound of wheat and every product of labor, East, West, North, and South, for the purpose of sustaining a particular policy special to New England. The South thought it detrimental to themselves; the West thought it detrimental to themselves; and I know it is detrimental to the coast to which I belong, for we pay an immense taxation, for the privilege of being governed, to the manufacturers of New England, and they have become so prosperous that enterprise cannot compete with them in other parts of the country. Enterprise in California cannot compete with them, because they have been built up with such colossal strength by the legislation of the Federal Government. The Democratic party which represents the cardinal democratic principles does live, has its ancient vitality, and will once again occupy its dominant place upon this floor. Do not think they are dead if for awhile they sleep.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment to the fifth section.

Mr. DAVIS. I submitted an amendment to strike out that section, and I now propose to say a few words in support of my amendment. It has been my habit from the time I have been a member of the Senate to oppose every measure and every proposition that I deemed to be an infraction of the Constitution or an aggression upon the liberties of the people. I intend to persevere in that course; I intend to do it persistently, stubbornly; and there is no consideration whatever that will induce me to pause or to relax a solitary instant in that line of duty according to my judgment and discretion. In conformity to that principle of duty I now proceed to make some remarks in support of the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. President, it is a great problem whether there is not national as well as individual insanity. I believe that there is such a thing as national insanity; but when insanity seizes upon a nation it is not in the form of general insanity; it is only monomania. I am perfectly satisfied that that form of insanity has seized upon this nation, that it rests in the two Houses of Congress, that it droops over the Senate with fatal mischief to the nation and to the people. Upon that proposition I have no doubt, because I cannot conceive upon any other principle how the legislation of Congress, and how the legislation of the Senate, should be in such utter disregard of the Constitution of the United States and of the liberties and the prosperity of the people of America.

Mr. President, there are good lawyers in this body, and among the very best is the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] if not the very ablest in the nation. This degree of insanity has reached him, even; and if it is of such a nature that it can approach the State of Maryland and enchain upon the seat of reason the lofty intellect and the profound legal learning of the honorable Senator from Maryland, what is to be expected in relation to the lesser lights here that claim to be jurists, and especially those from that region of the United States that is so flagrantly infected by this insanity? Now, I will propound to my honorable friend, the Senator from Maryland, one or two propositions, and I will ask him to debate with himself whether they are not irrefutably true. The first is, that our Constitution creates a Government of limited powers. The second is, that every power not conferred by the Constitution upon the United States is reserved to the people or the States respectively. From these two propositions I know he will not and cannot dissent. I now proceed to propound another proposition, and this is the principal one: in the construction of instruments of writing, of the law, and of the Constitution, a universal principle which is never to be departed from is, that where there is positive prohibition of power or a positive creation of right by the language of the instrument, that right and that prohibition of power can never be subverted by any implied authority. I hold that that principle is as immovable as the eternal hills; that it has received the recognition of all the courts of England and of America, that where an instrument of writing, be it in the form of a contract or a constitution, contains a clause in positive language, that clause cannot be subverted or restricted in its operation by any implied power. Apply that principle of universal construction to the question under consideration, and what does it amount to? In the Constitution of the United States we find the plainest and most positive guarantees of the rights of property; we find it asserted in the plainest and most positive language, that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law, and that no man's property shall be taken for public use except upon just compensation being made. Now, I ask my honorable friend from Illinois, if these are not rights positively guaranteed by the plain letter of the Constitution to every citizen, and I ask him, then, whether any power or any right arising by mere implication can have the effect of subverting the right secured by this positive language of the Constitution.

Sir, I say that such positive powers are not to be overturned and subverted by implication, and that the Supreme Court of the United States, in the great case of McCulloch vs. Maryland, and in many other cases, has sustained that principle. Further, sir, I assert that there is not a respectable State court in America that does not sustain it as a general principle, in the construction of all instruments, that a positive, express power cannot be changed or subverted or affected by an implied power.

I have shown, by adverting to the clauses of the Constitution, that there is the most express and explicit guarantee of a right of property in that instrument to the citizen. Now, I say that the measure under consideration in the clause which I have moved to strike out imports nothing more nor less than an infringement and total disregard in relation to the subject under consideration of those provisions of the Constitution which guaranty the right of property. My principle, then, would be that General Sherman, even while war was pending and he was in the field and occupying a portion of the country as a conqueror, would have no right to raise by implication a military power that would at all conflict with, much less subvert, for the time, these positive guarantees of our Constitution, of the rights of property in the citizen.

But, Mr. President, I do not at present think proper to insist upon the principle to that extent. I waive it in relation to its application to a time of war. I now assume that the country is at peace; the President has said so in his communications here. We all know the fact. It is as palpable as night and daylight at their respective hours in the twenty-four. It is a proposition that nothing but passion or selfishness or villainy in some form will ever controvert. It cannot be controverted. You might as well try to controvert the fact, in noon day, when the heavens are cloudless, that the sun is shining.

Now, Mr. President, the country being in peace, the question is, whether these military possessory titles, or the mere right of possession given by General Sherman, can be confirmed by the present measure or by any other action of Congress. I say it cannot. It is not my purpose now to impugn General Sherman. I believe that the only particle of statesmanship that was exhibited by any military commander during the war was exhibited by him in his arrangement with Johnston; and I believe that if that arrangement had been taken up in good faith, and had been confirmed and executed by the Government, the restoration of the Union, and not only that, but the harmony and fraternity of the people of the United States, at this time, would be perfect. My present position is this: that the possessory rights which General Sherman granted to the negroes ceased with the cessation of hostilities. That principle is a principle of national law, and it would apply at this time, under the present state of circumstances, between independent Powers. I illustrate it in this way: suppose England and the United States had been at war, or the United States and Mexico, and we had made conquests in Canada or in some of the provinces of Mexico, and our commander, General Scott, in the late Mexican war, or any other general, had granted to American citizens, or to any persons whatever, the possession of lands there, precisely in the terms in which General Sherman has granted these lands to the negroes in the South, the moment that that war ceased the possession conferred by the military commander would terminate, and those who owned the lands previously would be entitled to resume possession of them. I will read a section of law from Phillimore in support of that principle:

"The conqueror dethrones the sovereign and assumes the dominion of the conquered territory; but as a general rule he does no more."

Now, sir, apply that principle to this intestine war, and all that was effected as our conquering armies marched through the South and occupied the country was simply to dethrone the power of the confederate government.

"The conqueror dethrones the sovereign and assumes the dominion of the conquered territory; but as a general rule he does no more. It has been well said down by the tribunals of the North American United States that the modern usage of nations, that large and important part of the international law, would be violated, the sense of justice and of right, which is felt and acknowledged by the civilized world, would be outraged, if private property were generally confiscated and private rights annulled. The people, indeed, change their allegiance; their relation to their ancient sovereign is dissolved; but their relations to each other and their rights of property remain undisturbed."

All the power that Congress has, all the power that the Government of the United States has, in relation to the late insurrection, is to suppress it. They have not a particle of power outside of that which is imported by that term. The honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] in his masterly argument drew a correct distinction between the power of war and the power to suppress insurrection under our Government. He stated truly, and he established the proposition beyond all doubt, that the one was the war power and the other was the simple power of police; that the simple power of police applied and inured to the benefit of the Government of the United States in putting down this insurrection, in "suppressing" it, to use the language of the Constitution, and that the war power, as it was created in the Constitution, had no application to the case; and no gentleman on this floor, or out of this Senate, can overturn that position, or shake it. Phillimore, treating of war between independent States, says expressly that where there is a war between independent States, and one country, or a portion of one country is conquered, the only effect is that the conquered country yields its political subjection to the conqueror, and the moment peace is declared and made, that moment the private property of the conquered people reverts to its owners.

Mr. President, if that is the law between foreign nations, with how much more force and truth is it the law in relation to our own country, and to our own fellow-citizens who were lately in revolt, and who have been subjected to obedience? If the South had been a portion of the English possessions, or the French possessions, or the possessions of any other foreign Power, according to this plain, explicit, and now universally received principle of national law, when General Sherman marched into Georgia and South Carolina, and subdued the country, and reduced it to subjection to the American arms, all the effect of that conquest would have been simply to transfer the political allegiance of the people to the Government of the United States; and if he had taken possession of private property, the moment that peace was made between the countries, that instant this private property, with all the rights of ownership, would be reinvested in the owners thereof, as though there had been no war at all.

This principle demonstrates beyond all doubt or reasonable contradiction that neither the Senate nor the Congress of the United States have any power to confirm these possessory titles, or the mere naked right of possession, to this property, keeping out the rightful owners of that property one day after peace has been declared, one day after peace in fact exists, one day in fact after the suppression of the insurrection. The suppression of the insurrection makes the peace. It is only a great riot; it is only a great sedition. Wherever a riot, or sedition, or insurrection occurs in a country, where that country has a government like ours, the police power to quell the riot, to put down the sedition, to suppress the insurrection, applies; and so soon as the riot, or the sedition, or insurrection is put down, the office and power of the Government over the matter ceases; the power then becomes functus officio; and all the rights of the citizens, all their obligations to the Government, and all their rights of private property immediately apply, as though there had been no riot, no sedition, no insurrection.

Now, Mr. President, I will make one further remark and then take my seat. I have heard the cry of "Mad dog!" "Mad dog!" and then the multitude shout, "Kill him! kill him! damn him, kill him!" The South has been a mad dog; the South has acted with folly and great criminality; but the South has been subdued; the South has come back to its allegiance; the South has resumed its reason and its loyalty. The mind and the reason of the South have become satisfied of the impossibility and folly of that insurrection which it made against the Government of the United States. It has become convinced in its deepest reason that its duty to itself and its safety requires a perfect obedience to the authority of the United States and to the laws and Constitution of the United States. It offers now, not in its passion, not in its weakness, not in its fears, to come back and render its allegiance to its country and its Government; but in the deepest convictions of its reason, it offers to render noble, manly, just, and proper tribute to the supremacy of the Government of the United States. How is that proposition received? All the frenzied people of the North, all the strong-minded spinsters of New England, all the fighting clergy of the northern States who are for letting slip the dogs of war and crying havoc, all the Black Republican party, dyed in the wool, who hold office obtained in this crusade against slavery, and who expect to retain it only by keeping up this crusade and this fierce and irrational frenzy, all the Jacobins, all the men who belong to "The Mountain" of Washington city and America—for we have "The Mountain" here as they had it in France in the days of the French Revolution—all of them are now shouting "Mad dog! mad dog! kill him! kill him! damn him, kill him!" Sir, that spirit does not become a Christian people; it does not become a just people; it does not become a wise and politic people. No country can ever be permanently reduced to peace and order and fraternity and confidence and love and affection for its Government by pursuing any such policy. We are members of the same national family, and we should treat each other as we would treat our own private family; and the head of a family who would so treat his erring and sinning son, instead of winning back that son to duty and love, would make him his eternal and unforgiving enemy.

Believing that this section is in flagrant conflict with the Constitution and with the laws of nations governing even separate and independent States and securing to them belligerent rights, believing that it is in conflict with both codes of law, the national and constitutional, I move to strike it out from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question will first be on concurring in the amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole to the fifth section of the bill. The Senator from Kentucky moves to strike out that section. The parliamentary usage is to allow the section to be amended before a vote is taken on striking it out. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the fifth section of the bill.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to strike out the fifth section as amended.

Mr. DAVIS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, McDougall, Riddle, Sanisbury, Stockton, and Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Creswell, Henderson, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, and Williams—8.

So the Senate refused to strike out the fifth section of the bill.

The Secretary read the next amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole, which was to strike out the sixth section of the bill in the following words:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, be hereby empowered to purchase or rent such tracts of land in the several districts aforesaid as may be necessary to provide for the indigent refugees and freedmen dependent upon the Government for support; also to purchase sites and buildings for schools and asylums, to be held as United States property until the refugees or freedmen shall purchase the same, or they shall be otherwise disposed of by the Commissioner.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, procure in the name of the United States, by grant or purchase, such lands within the districts aforesaid as may be required for refugees and freedmen dependent on the Government for support; and he shall provide or cause to be erected suitable buildings for asylums and schools. But no such purchase shall be made, nor contract for the same entered into, nor other expense incurred, until after appropriations shall have been provided by Congress for the general purposes of this act, out of which payments for said lands shall be made. And the Commissioner shall cause such lands, from time to time, to be valued, allotted, assigned, and sold in manner and form provided in the preceding section, at a price not less than the cost thereof to the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in this amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the sixth section of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. After that amendment shall have been concurred in, it will be in order, as I understand, to move to strike out the whole section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the sixth section of the bill.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. I now move to strike out the sixth section as amended, and I desire to say a word or two upon that motion. Sir, I know how vain and useless any humble exertions I can make will be to defeat this measure; but I am determined to endeavor to do my little mite toward unveiling it, and toward exposing its monstrous deformity to the country.

My honorable friends from Indiana and Delaware [Mr. HENDRICKS and Mr. SAULSBURY] have established beyond all doubt the enormous cost which this bill will entail upon the Treasury of the United States, and I do not believe that they have exaggerated it. I agree with the honorable Senator from Delaware that the amount of the aggregate expenditure will depend very much on the discretion of the Executive; that if he is disposed to press the capacity for patronage which this bill would give him to its utmost limits in the great stress of a presidential canvass, it would be a source of enormous expenditure, and would confer upon him a most dangerous aggregation of power. I believe with the honorable Senator from Indiana that no economical administration which can be given to the bureau will cause the expenditure under this bill to be less than from thirty to fifty million dollars. I concur fully in the remarks that were made by my honorable colleague, attempting to reveal what will be the requirements upon the Treasury under this bill, to the extent that he went; and I believe that he underrated what will turn out to be in truth the expenditure.

I was present at a meeting of the Committee on Pensions this morning, and we had before us a proposition to increase the present rates of pensions, which was not disposed of. I can speak of the proposition because it has been referred by the order of the Senate to that committee. What is now the pay of a private soldier in the Army of the United States? I believe it is about sixteen dollars per month; I am not certain. Some gentleman on the Military Committee will perhaps inform me; however, it is not material.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is sixteen dollars a month.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, Mr. President, here is a bill that establishes a great system of lazzaroni, a great system of poor-houses for the support of lazy negroes all over the southern States. What is to be the cost of this system no political economist or statesman can tell. If Colbert were here, or Necker, or Turner, or any of the great financiers that Europe has produced, they could not tell within millions and tens of millions, probably hundreds of millions, of what is to be the cost of this system. What will be its effect? There are a certain class of men in this body, and in the other House, who think they know all about the negro; and not only that, they think they know all about all creation and all its concerns, and that if anybody presumes to put up opinions against theirs they are ninnyes or neophytes or nincompoops, and they are the Solomons. [Laughter.] With true characteristic national conceit, they are pulling down the great system of constitution and of policy and of legislation which was established by our fathers, the wisest and most virtuous men that ever lived. They have dared to rush in where angels would not tread; and when they see the confusion and ruin and bankruptcy that is about to result to the nation from their enormous mistakes in the conduct of this war, and in the administration of affairs since the war has closed, they are throwing themselves about like the blind Samson, and threaten to pull down the pillars of the State upon them and upon us.

A friend of mine remarked to me yesterday that there were some men here who were going to destruction very fast. I replied, "It is too true, but the misfortune is they are taking us and the country with them." Said he, "Suppose we were to unhitch ourselves and the country and back out, and let them go on to their destruction." I exclaimed, "In the name of God, let it be so;" but we cannot dispose of them in that way. They are moving on; they have us hitched to their chariot, and they are dragging us with resistless force and with incalculable speed to that destruction which they are bringing upon our common country.

My honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr.

COWAN,] whom I do not see in his seat, has presented various memorials here; for what purpose? The early enlisted soldiers in the late war, who met the storm of battle in its onset, and who received but $100 bounty, that great mass of meritorious patriots who saved the Union and the Government, without whose services and toils and sufferings it would have perished, are now knocking at the doors of Congress and asking that their bounties be equalized, and that they be allowed the same bounty that the negro has received. Sir, what are you going to do with these propositions? What is this Black Republican party going to do with the propositions? What are you going to do with the Treasury of the United States? Who can tell now what is the amount of the debt that is justly due, liquidated and unliquidated, by the Government of the United States? If I recollect aright, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House, during the past summer, then estimated it at at least $4,000,000,000. The interest of that would be $240,000,000 annually. You have a negro bureau before you that will produce another draft upon the Treasury of from $50,000,000 to $250,000,000, say $100,000,000 at least. You have a pension roll, which, if justice is done to the noble patriots who bared their bosoms to the iron storm of war, will call for another $100,000,000 at least. You have the maimed, the wounded, and disabled who took part in this late war, and the widows of those who have fallen, now knocking at your doors to have their pittance of a pension raised from eight dollars, so as to give them barely bread and raiment and shelter. When they come here and ask that the pittance of eight dollars a month shall be raised to twelve or thirteen or sixteen dollars a month, where is the man in the Senate or the House that dare get up and speak or vote against such a just proposition? I believe some officer connected with the War Department says that the claim for the increase of bounties will amount to about $400,000,000. I think that is an exaggeration; but suppose it amounts to $200,000,000, and then when you increase the pension roll $50,000,000 more, making $250,000,000, are you willing to incur a further expenditure for the establishment of negro poor-houses?

A negro will never work when he can keep soul and body together without work. I know the negro nature better than all the Yankees in this body, or that live upon this continent. [Laughter.] I know that if he can live without work, he will not work. If he can live by begging, he will not work. If he can live by stealing, he will not work. If he can live in the southern States upon the spontaneous fruits and vegetables of the land that grow up by the force of the climate and of a luxuriant soil, he will not work. He will bask, with his wife and children in squalid rags and poverty, in the sunshine; but so long as he can hold body and soul together he will never work. What are you offering to do now? To give him subsistence, transportation, asylums; school-houses, school teachers, churches, and I suppose somebody to preach in their churches. All these supplies you propose to give to the negro. Do you not think that there will be a general pilgrimage of all the negroes in the United States toward these establishments? There will be, just as certain as you and I live.

Here, then, Mr. President, is $850,000,000 for increased pensions and for the increase of the bounty of the first soldiers of the war, and then comes in $250,000,000 more to be expended under this bill, making $600,000,000 to be added to our expenditures. Where is the money to come from to pay it? Where is the people on earth more ground to the dast by taxation than the people of America? Are the gentlemen from California and from the gold and silver mines of Nevada ready to pay an ad valorem rate of taxation upon the products of their lands to meet all these burdens upon the Treasury? I appeal to the hardy farmers of the Northwest, those gallant and hard-handed men, who live upon small tracts of land of one hundred acres, or something like that, and who have to toil day in and day out and live economically to make the two ends meet at the close of the year, to educate their children and give their families the ordinary comforts of life, and many of them have no surplus to lay up for old age and for the wintry day of life; are they ready and willing to pay an ad valorem tax, or a direct tax, upon their lands for the purpose of meeting the expenses of this lazzaroni, this great system of negro poor-houses? It will come to that. Sir, you must stop expenditures, you must retrench, reform, economize; instead of increasing your expenditures you must greatly reduce them; otherwise repudiation will be inevitable. I want no repudiation, but I want the severest economy practiced by the Government, to bring the burden of the people, which they have to meet in the form of taxation, within such a limit that they can shoulder and move along with it with the proud and erect step of freemen, and still live, and not to be bowed down in penury and vassalage to the millionaires who own the public debt.

I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment that I have proposed.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, I know of scarcely a higher duty than has been imposed by the result of this war upon the Government, to provide for the very contingencies embraced within the provisions of this bill; I know of no higher obligation than to make all necessary provision for the protection and the elevation of this race, for their protection in their civil rights and in the enjoyment of their proper pursuits, and for their protection in all the civil relations of life. I know of but one higher duty devolving upon the Senate, and that is the obligation to abide by the Constitution. I stand here under the obligation of an oath to support that Constitution, and having come to the conclusion, from the arguments that have been made during the progress of this discussion, that Congress has no power to grant the provisions contained within this section, I shall, since the yeas and nays have been called, be compelled to vote to strike it out.

I come to this conclusion with very great regret, because the able committee who have had this subject in charge, after full investigation no doubt, have come to the conclusion that the provisions of this section would result very much to the advantage of the freedmen of this country. It is possible that they would. Nevertheless, as I have said, there is a higher obligation which is to guide my conduct in the premises, and that is obedience to what I conceive to be the obligations of constitutional law. Believing that the proposition contained in this section is unconstitutional, I must vote to strike the section from the bill. I shall do it with the less reluctance, because it seems to me the powers granted in this section and the provisions made in it are not indispensably necessary to accomplish the object contemplated by the bill. The freedmen may be protected, and proper provision be made for them, without the grant of the power contained in this section; and besides, it seems to me that it contains, however beneficial its effect might be in other respects, one vicious principle.

Whatever my friend from Kentucky may know about the habits of the negroes, I think he is very much mistaken in regard to their habits of idleness. They have been idle; but who would not be idle if his labor was not to result in his own benefit? Who would not be idle if he received no wages for his toil? What race would not be, comparatively, in the condition in which the Senator has represented the colored race, who for long ages had been held in slavery, receiving nothing for their toil but a bare pittance to live upon? Give them hopes, give them a prospect of bettering their condition in the future; adopt measures that will tend to stimulate industry and to stimulate a hope of improvement in their condition, and that idleness, to some extent at least, will pass away. It must be admitted, however, that from the habits, education, and condition of the negro, he has hitherto been a dependent being;

he has been dependent upon his master; he has leaned upon him for support. That is his habit, that is his education, that is his nature; and in so far as this bill makes provision that will tend to foster and keep up this influence over the negro, I think the bill is vicious. Are not the provisions of this bill of a nature calculated to produce that result? Does it not provide homes for him, purchase lands for him, hold out inducements to him still to be dependent upon the Government, which is to make provision for his wants, to provide a house for him to live in, a school for him where he may be educated, an asylum in which he may find refuge in times of distress and helplessness, and various other propositions, all looking to the same result—the fostering of the habit in the negro of leaning and relying upon some other power for help and support?

My idea is that the negro would be most benefited by such a policy as would place him as soon as possible upon his own responsibility, and in that situation would protect him in the enjoyment of all his rights and privileges. He would be sooner elevated in the scale of humanity; he would sooner acquire habits of industry and self-subsistence. It seems to me that the provisions of this bill to some extent would have a deleterious effect upon the negro, because it would still pander to his native habits of reliance upon others for support and protection and provision. I shall, therefore, vote with the less reluctance for striking out this section, because I believe it contains within it, to some extent, a vicious principle. But I am constrained to vote against it because I believe Congress has no power to vest the President with any such authority as is given to him in this bill, has no power to purchase lands, has no power to make itself a landlord and to receive the black men as tenants under it, has no power to purchase land to build schools and asylums; and in that respect it comes in conflict with another principle which has been very popular here; it does make a distinction on account of color between the two races.

Mr. DAVIS. One word in reply to the honorable Senator from West Virginia. He adverted to the picture of indolence, of vagrancy, and of poverty that I had drawn of the negro, and attributed that to the fact that the negroes who had those habits, and were in that condition, received no reward for their labor. I beg to inform my honorable friend that it was the free negro exclusively of whom I was talking and whom I was describing. The slave negro is made to work, or has been heretofore, by his master. His health and his comforts were all cared for. He was fully and comfortably fed, well clothed, well housed, taken care of in his sickness and in his old age. All those features of the slave negro depart, in the State of Kentucky, and have done so from time immemorial, from the freed negro the moment he is turned out to the enjoyment of his freedom.

Why, sir, the vagabond negroes that are hovering over this Capitol like a dark cloud have been allured from labor to idleness by the measures of Congress. It is such measures as this that seduce them from labor, from throwing themselves upon their own resources, as the honorable Senator from West Virginia says they ought to be thrown, and that brings them here. If you would just introduce measures that would start these lazy, indolent negroes from this Capitol out to work, they could themselves make enough to subsist all the paupers, and ten times as many, in this District of Columbia. This is only one rendezvous of lazy, indolent negroes. There are thousands of them scattered all over the whole of the slave States. Sir, change your policy; introduce measures that will drive these negroes from the cities, that will start them out to work, and to work upon their own responsibility. There is no truth in the idea of these negroes becoming the dupes and the victims of the white man. There is no truth in it.

My honorable colleague gave a picture of what has always been the policy of Kentucky, and the laws of Kentucky, toward free negroes.

With a few exceptions, they have all the civil rights that any white man has. They are subject to some severer penalties: for instance, rape committed by a white man is punishable by confinement in the penitentiary; when perpetrated by a negro upon a white woman, it is punishable by death, and it will be so punishable in that State until the last trump blows. All the legislation that may be devised by Congress, and all the oppressive and unjust discriminations sought to be introduced against the white man, and to stifle the reserved rights of the States, to overthrow their governments and their independence of legislation—all these measures will never drive the State of Kentucky from a modification of that law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to strike out the sixth section of the bill, as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, McDougall, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Willey, and Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Creswell, Foster, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Pomeroy, Stockton, and Williams—8.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments made in committee have been severally concurred in. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. If I can have the attention of the chairman of the committee for one moment, I propose to him to insert after the word "refugees," in the fourth line of the fourth section, as amended, the words "male and female," so that it shall be applicable to women as well as men. I do not doubt that in point of law as it stands now it will be so applicable, but there are persons who have raised a question with regard to that, and in order to satisfy them and relieve their anxiety, I propose that we shall introduce those words, so that there shall be no question about it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it will be satisfactory to any friend of the bill to have those words inserted, I see no objection to them, but I certainly see no necessity for them. "Freedmen" and "refugees" are general terms, embracing all of them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I believe that in a very ancient law book, perhaps the most ancient one known to good lawyers, it is said that "God created man in his own image; in the image of God created He him; male and female created He them."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the bill in section one, line seven, by inserting after the words "United States" the words "in which the laws cannot be administered in the civil courts;" so that it will read:

That the act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, approved March 3, 1865, shall continue in force until otherwise provided by law, and shall extend to refugees and freedmen in all parts of the United States in which the laws cannot be administered in the civil courts, and the President may divide the section of country, &c.

I ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I will explain this amendment in a single word. The honorable Senator from Michigan, who is not only the putative, but I believe the real father of this measure, in connection probably with a little counsel from the office of the Attorney General, said a few days ago that the object of the creation of the tribunals under this measure, and of the exercise of their jurisdiction, was to operate in States where the law could not be executed in the civil courts. My simple proposition of amendment is this: that this measure shall not apply to any State where the civil law can be executed in the civil courts, and that is the whole of it.

Mr. HOWARD. If the honorable Senator from Kentucky alluded to me in his reference to the paternity of this bill he is entirely mistaken. I have had no connection with the bill at all, directly or indirectly.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, McDougall, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Creswell, Foster, and Johnson—4.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following as a substitute:

That the President be empowered and directed to execute the Constitution, and laws enacted under the same, for the protection and benefit of freedmen and refugees, and that he may use such of the military force of the country for this purpose as he may find necessary.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think that amendment is in order at the present time. It will be in order, if I understand the rules of the Senate, when all the amendments to the original bill are disposed of. The bill is to be perfected, to use a hackneyed parliamentary term, before a proposition to substitute another measure in lieu of it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is in order at the present time; but before the question is taken on striking out, it will be in order for the Senator from Kentucky, or any other Senator, to amend the part proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, I move this proposition as a substitute for the entire bill. We are now engaged in the very vain work of undertaking by legislation to administer upon such things as may be the accident of the hour or the accident of the day. We are undertaking to provide general rules and laws that pertain to government, in and about business that belongs properly to administration. There are three departments of government recognized under our system: the legislative, as being nearest the organizing power, the executive, and the judicial; the latter two properly subject to the former more or less in point of real dignity, yet made equal in power in their several spheres. All that belongs to the management of the enfranchised slave must necessarily depend upon judicious administration. What may be necessary in Louisiana may not be necessary in Maryland. What may be necessary in South Carolina may not be necessary in Kentucky. It is a question of administration to be applied wisely. This Freedmen's Bureau is the result of an organization under the executive power of the United States. All its authority, after all, rests upon that. It is a matter of administration. The President of the United States, being clothed with proper authority, may realize all that can be desired, applying administration to the various points where administration is required, justly, according to circumstances. No general law, no general system of administration, no general popular judiciary, will answer that as well as the application of the Constitution and laws, protecting all persons, carrying out the spirit of the constitutional amendment, laws passed in pursuance of it protecting them with the judgment of our Chief Executive so far as they need protection. It is the best way, the most economical way, and the most constitutional way that we can express the power of this Government to protect the freedmen under the provision in the Constitution that all laws made in pursuance of it by Congress shall belong to the supreme law of the land. It will be infinitely better; it will save complexity. Our legislation now is full of confusion, and many men are confused about simple questions of constitutional law. This legislation here will lead to confusion. A simple law, clothing the Executive with sufficient power to aid in carrying out the amendment to the Constitution and the laws which may be passed in accordance with it, will answer all purposes, will answer what General Grant suggests in his report.

Sir, I would rather trust to a man elected by the people of the United States to the high place of Chief Magistrate to advise when and how this power shall be exercised than to this loose, and, I will say, uninformed legislation; for what information have the Senators on this floor with regard to the condition of things in the South? Both parties are making reports. If we ask what the condition of North Carolina is, what the condition of Louisiana is, what the condition of Georgia is, we receive a report. What information does that carry to you, gentlemen, or what does it carry to me? As a general rule, it is simply a partisan report, unreliable, as, I may say, newspaper reports generally are. There is not a person who can understand the quadratic equation that can resolve out of any given statement of the reporters whether a thing is so or not so.

In my opinion, it will be wiser to trust this power to the President, for it belongs to administration, not legislation. It cannot be brought within the purview of legislation. We cannot make rules for it, for we do not know the condition of things in the South. I live in a northern State, a free State, far away from here. I do not know how things are in these southern States, and I think there is no Senator on this floor who understands the condition of the South any better than I do. I was born and have lived in the North, but it has been my fortune to mingle more with the people of the United States, both North and South, than most gentlemen who occupy seats on this floor. I say none of us understand their condition. It has to be administered by a knowledge of particular cases, and I would rather trust a man whom the people were willing to elevate to the high office of President with the particular administration, than trust general rules pronounced by persons who know nothing of and about that which they legislate; and I undertake to say that Congress has been legislating of and about things of which they are profoundly ignorant.

I move this amendment as a substitute for the whole bill, and call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the substitute is voted upon, there are one or two verbal amendments that ought to be made in the bill. In the second section of the bill, line two, I move to strike out the word "shall" and insert "may," so as to read:

The President may divide each district into a number of sub-districts, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In line four of the same section I move to strike out the words "each State," and insert in lieu thereof "such district;" so as to read:

Not to exceed the number of counties or parishes in such district.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In section six—

Mr. DAVIS. I rise to a point of order. I believe it is the order to read the bill section by section. I have some amendments to propose to a preceding section, and I want to offer them as the sections are read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK.) The Senator from Kentucky rises to a question of order.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to know my rights. I have no objection to the gentleman's course if I am allowed to offer my amendments afterward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to offer an amendment to the second section; and my point of order is that it is not in order to proceed to a subsequent section until the second section and all the amendments relating to it are disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kentucky and to the Senate that there is no such rule of order of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I stand corrected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be in order for the Senator to move his amendment after the Senator from Illinois shall have offered his amendments.

Mr. DAVIS. I make this inquiry, though, of the Chair: will it be in order for me, after the propositions of the Senator from Illinois are disposed of, to move an amendment to the second section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To any part of the bill the Senator chooses.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My object is not to interfere at all with the Senator's amendments. He certainly must know as well as any of us that it is in order for him to offer any amendment that he thinks proper to offer to any portion of the bill. I merely desired to correct one or two verbal inaccuracies that, on account of amendments to the bill, it has become necessary to correct. In the thirteenth and fourteenth lines of the sixth section, I move to strike out the words "preceding section," and insert "fourth section of this act." The preceding section as the bill is now amended is not the one intended to be referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose I shall now have a chance.

Mr. McDUGALL. I think the yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment which I offered, and I ask that the question be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon it.

Mr. McDUGALL. And nothing else is in order in the way of business. As a matter of courtesy to the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, I yielded to allow him to make his verbal amendments; but the question now is on the substitute I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from California that it is in order for any Senator to move to amend the bill before taking the question on striking it all out and inserting a substitute. The Senator from Kentucky is in order.

Mr. McDUGALL. A substitute having been offered and the yeas and nays ordered on the substitute, until that question has been disposed of an amendment is not in order, according to what I understand to be parliamentary law. I may be ignorant on the subject, but I think I am right. Otherwise there must be some very bad logic in our rules of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from California that it is first in order to move to amend the part proposed to be stricken out, then to amend the part proposed to be inserted, and then to take the question on the amendment by way of substitution altogether.

Mr. DAVIS. I unfortunately a short time since referred to the Senator from Michigan. I intended to refer to the Senator from Illinois. It was a mere inadvertence. I did not hear the disclaimer of my friend from Michigan at the time, or I would have made the correction then. I now offer the following amendment—

Mr. McDUGALL. Allow me to inquire whether that is an amendment to my substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will answer the Senator from California when the amendment shall have been reported from the desk so that he may know what it is.

The Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. DAVIS, which was in section two, line fifteen, after the word "class" to strike out these words:

And the President of the United States, through the War Department and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employees, agents, and officers of this bureau in the exercise of the duties imposed or authorized by this act and the act to which this is additional.

Mr. McDUGALL. I rise to a question of order. I think we should conform to some rules that can be understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order without debate.

Mr. McDUGALL. I presume I may explain it. That is allowed always. The motion pending, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered, is a substitute for the entire bill. You can amend an amendment; but this is not an amendment to the proposition which I introduced, and which has been already ordered to a vote of the Senate, but it is an amendment to the original bill. I insist, with all due respect to the President of the Senate, that before the subject-matter of my amendment or my substitute is disposed of no vote can be taken except in relation to it. I believe that was the law as long ago as Mr. Jefferson wrote his Manual. I have a right to a vote on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no hesitation in overruling the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the words that I now move to strike out show the claws of the beast. They refer to the interposition of the military power to suppress the action of the courts in the States. If the honorable Senator from Illinois will withdraw his interposition of the military power to carry into execution this most unjust and iniquitous measure in the States, I care not for it. But, sir, here is invoked the military power of the United States Government to suppress and subvert the judicial power of all the States in interfering between the white man and the freedman. I therefore move this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the next section be read.

Mr. McDUGALL. I ask still if my motion is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has once decided the point of order. The Senator can appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will not appeal from the decision of the Chair, because I do not like to do futile things.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the next section in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Any part of the bill to which the Senator proposes an amendment. The amendment the Senator last proposed was to the second section.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to strike out the fifth section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that that question has already been taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well, sir; I move, then, an amendment to the seventh section by inserting the words "and cannot be enforced" after the word "rebellion" in the third line, so as to make the section read:

That whenever in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and cannot be enforced, and wherein, &c.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I now move to amend the eighth section by inserting after the word "rebellion" in the fifth line the words "and cannot be enforced." This is the same amendment which has just been voted down, only applying to a different section; that is all.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer another amendment to come in at the end of the eighth section:

Provided, That the Commissioner, assistant commissioners, agents, or any other officer, acting under this act or the law to which it is amendatory, shall not exercise any judicial powers whatever.

Upon this amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the call of the roll was commenced.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senate will indulge me, I propose to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and ask for them on another proposition which is similar to this amendment. By unanimous consent, I desire to have leave to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope unanimous consent will be given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. McDUGALL. There is.

The call of the roll was concluded, and the result announced—yeas 8, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, McDougall, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Wright—8.
NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Crowell, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Guthrie, Henderson, Johnson, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, and Sprague—8.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I now offer this amendment, to come in as a proviso at the end of the eighth section:

Provided, That the Commissioner, assistant commissioners, agents, or any other officers acting under this act, or the law to which it is amendatory, shall not exercise any judicial powers whatever in any State in which the laws can be enforced by the civil courts.

I will say but a word in explanation of this amendment. The President by the provisions of this bill is authorized to assign military officers to the discharge of duties under it. The bill then contemplates that judicial power in the Government of the United States, which can be exercised according to the command of the Constitution only by courts, shall be exercised by such military officers as the President may assign to the performance of those duties. This amendment is simply that those duties shall not be performed by the Commissioner of the bureau, or by the assistant commissioners, or by any of the agents, be they civilians or military officers, in any State where the courts are open and where the laws may be enforced and executed in the civil courts of the country. That is the whole proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have abstained from making any remarks on the various amendments which have been proposed by the Senator from Kentucky and the numerous speeches he has made denouncing the different provisions of the bill as unconstitutional. He now proposes a section asserting that judicial powers shall not be exercised by these commissioners where the civil courts are in operation. I have not abstained from replying to him because I did not think there was a ready answer to all that he has said in his speeches and to every one of his amendments, but because I thought we should soonest get action on the bill by voting silently upon them. I endeavored at an early stage of our proceedings upon this bill to express my views in reference to it. I claim to be as much devoted to the Constitution as the Senator from Kentucky. I would vote for no law in violation of it. When he rises here and appeals to the Constitution and asserts that the Constitution is being violated, he only says that that is his opinion. I do not think it is being violated. I have just as high regard for it as he has; and while I vote silently against this amendment and sit silent under these speeches, it is not because there is not a perfect answer in my judgment to every one of his positions.

Now, a word in reference to the particular amendment before us. He would have the country believe that here was a proposition to establish courts in States where the civil tribunals of the country are in full operation, and its judicial tribunals uninterfered with. There is no such proposition in the bill. The bill already provides that the judicial powers conferred upon these officers are to be exercised only in localities where the civil tribunals have been overborne, and when the time comes that these insurgent States shall be restored in their constitutional relations to the Government, which I trust may soon come, no judicial power will remain in any of the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau. That is the provision of the bill already.

But, sir, I did not rise to make any other remarks in reference to it than simply to say that in silently voting against this proposition, and in sitting silent under the assertions which the Senator has so often made, I did not wish it to be taken for granted that we had not a ready reply to his assertions, nor that the bill did not already provide for the very thing that he is seeking to provide for.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I appeal to the recollection of the Senate, if the honorable Senator did not assert in the set speech which he made in support of this measure a few days ago, that its purpose was to include the States of Delaware and Kentucky. He now says that this bill is not to apply to any State in which the courts are open for the enforcement of civil law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sure that the Senator from Kentucky would not mean to misunderstand me.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. His sense of fairness, however we may disagree, is such that I do not think he would intentionally misstate my position.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course I would not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I never said, and never intended to say, that this bill did not apply anywhere but to the insurgent States. Now I hope I am understood. The bill does apply to other States; but that portion of the bill which confers judicial power upon the officers of the bureau does not apply to the other States, but is confined to those where the judicial tribunals have been overthrown.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course I do not intend to misstate or to misunderstand the honorable Senator from Illinois, for two simple reasons. In the first place, he is here to correct me if I should misrepresent him; and, in the second place, a much higher principle actuates me: my own self-respect would prevent me from misrepresenting him.

But I do understand this bill entirely different from his present construction of it. He certainly announced on the day and in the speech to which I have referred, that it was his purpose that this bill should apply to the States of Delaware and Kentucky. Well, as I read the bill, and as I understand it, there is not a provision or power in the bill, or conferred by it, that will not apply as well to those States as to any of the States lately in insurrection. If that be the meaning of the honorable chairman who reported this bill, when I get up and offer an amendment providing that this bill shall not apply to any of the States in which the courts are open for the enforcement of the civil law, why does he not propose that, so far as this confers or attempts to confer judicial power, it shall not be applicable to any States in which the courts are open, and in which the laws may be enforced?

He makes no such proposition, and I do not understand that the bill, if it becomes a law, as I have no doubt it will become a law, is susceptible of that interpretation or construction. No, sir; no, sir. This bill has been constructed upon consultation, and upon consultation by men in Kentucky and from Kentucky, as I am informed, with the honorable chairman. And it is one of the main purposes of this bill on the part of the men who have been in consultation with him—I will not say on his part—that it shall apply, and that it shall apply in all of its requisitions of military power, to interfere with the courts in the State of Kentucky; and I want the bill so worded that it shall have no such application.

The simple proposition of my amendment is that the officers under this bureau shall not assume any judicial powers in any State where the courts are open and where the civil laws may be enforced. The courts are open in Kentucky as much so as they are in Illinois. The civil laws can be enforced there in our civil courts by that medium just as effectually as they can in Illinois, or Massachusetts, or any other State. If the purpose is not that the courts in the State of Kentucky shall be invaded with all the military power invoked by this bill for the protection of all agents and persons acting under it, why does not the honorable Senator accept the proposition that the Commissioner and officers acting under this bill shall not assume judicial powers in any State where the courts are open for the enforcement of the civil law? That is the whole proposition of the amendment, and on it I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, McDougall, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Wright—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Crowell, Johnson, Morrill, and Nesmith—5.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I now offer an amendment to this bill in the form of an additional section, to come in after the eighth section:

And be it further enacted, That from each and every decision between parties made by the Commissioner, or any assistant commissioner, agent, or other officer of the Freedmen's Bureau, an appeal or writ of error may be prosecuted to the district or circuit court of the United States for the district in which such decision may have been made, and from the judgment of such district or circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States by any party or person who may think himself, herself, or themselves aggrieved thereby; and upon such party or person entering into bond with good and sufficient security in the clerk's office of said court, to abide by and perform the final judgment of the matter from which such appeal or writ of error is prosecuted, and to pay such costs and damages as may be awarded to any parties or persons by reason of the prosecution of the same, further proceedings shall be suspended until the final judgment of such matter.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer another amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That any person who may think himself or herself aggrieved by any proceedings of the Commissioner, any assistant commissioner, or agent, or other person connected with this bureau, shall have the right to apply to the proper court for a writ of prohibition against such proceedings; and any person or persons who may apply for such writ, and the court to which such application may be made, shall not in any way be disturbed or hindered in such application, or the issuing of such writ; and in all cases in which such writ may be directed and issued, it shall be respected and obeyed by all persons whatsoever.

I will say a word in explanation of this amendment. A court that has no jurisdiction of a subject has no right to try it; and where any court presumes to exercise a jurisdiction of that kind it is the right of any party who is about to be aggrieved or thinks himself or herself about to be aggrieved by such a proceeding, to move a superior court for a writ of prohibition commanding—

Mr. McDUGALL. Allow me to suggest that the writ of prohibition is an old common law writ, and the courts have a right to issue it without legislation.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator will read the amendment, he will understand that it has other elements in it besides that. I admit that it is a matter of right for any party in any proceeding, in any tribunal that has not jurisdiction of the subject-matter, to move for a writ of prohibition; and that is granted of right, as suggested by the honorable Senator from California; but here is the difficulty—

Mr. McDUGALL. I said that it was a common law writ, not a writ of right.

Mr. DAVIS. I say it is a matter of right that every party to a suit in a court which assumes jurisdiction of a subject over which it has no rightful jurisdiction may apply for a writ of prohibition. I hope the Senator understands me.

Mr. McDUGALL. I agree to that.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I see as clearly how this matter is intended to operate in Kentucky, and how it will be executed in Kentucky as I shall three months hence when the whole scheme shall have been put in execution. Let me state how it is intended to operate. One of these assistant commissioners or agents decides a judicial case between a negro and a white man; he assumes jurisdiction of it. The white man knows, or thinks he knows, that the assistant commissioner or the agent has no jurisdiction in the matter. What does he do? He applies to one of our State courts, if you please, or to the Federal district court, for a writ of prohibition against the assistant commissioner or the agent from further proceedings in the case. What is done then? For daring to apply for that writ of prohibition the citizen is taken possession of by the military power. What else is done? If he applies to a State court for a writ of prohibition, and that State court grants the writ on the ground that the law is unconstitutional, void, of no effect, that it invests in this Freedmen's Bureau judicial powers when the Constitution of the United States expressly says that judicial power shall be exercised only by the Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish; and if the officer of the court proceeds to execute the writ, this military power in Kentucky, organized and authorized to interpose for the protection of all persons acting under this Freedmen's Bureau, immediately arrests the court and the officer of the court who is about to execute the writ of prohibition. That will be its effect, and that the Attorney General of the United States designs shall be its effects and operation in the State of Kentucky—a man (God save the mark!) who is called Attorney General of the United States! He has been concocting an iniquitous and bold and lawless and unconstitutional scheme to have this effect in Kentucky.

Sir, I know, with the Senator from California, that any man who chooses may apply for a writ of prohibition; but under this bill any man who makes that application is subject to be arrested by the military. The bill authorizes the military to interpose for the protection of the negro; and how is it to interpose for his protection? If our court of appeals or any of our courts grant a writ of prohibition against one of these assistant commissioners, or agents, immediately the military power is summoned, and it seizes and imprisons in a distant bastille the citizen who dares to claim the right of applying to the courts of his State and of his country for a writ of prohibition against an illegal proceeding undertaken by an unconstitutional tribunal. And if the court of appeals or the circuit courts of Kentucky, or any court, State or Federal, in that State grants a writ of prohibition against such a proceeding, and puts it in the hands of a sheriff, a sergeant-at-arms, or a marshal for execution, that officer and the court who directed that writ of prohibition are immediately liable to be seized by this military power and imprisoned.

Sir, the bill was designed to bring about that state of things in Kentucky. That is its meaning; that is its language; that is its spirit; that is its purpose—all devised, contemplated, and desired by the highest law officer of the United States, as I am informed. I protest against any such tyranny. In the name of my State, in the name of the constitutions of my country, State and Federal, in the name of the liberties of the people, I protest against any such scheme, structure, or military tyranny being devised and put upon foot by the Congress of the United States. All that I ask now is, that this monster, with its great sharp claws sticking out, shall be subjected to the revision and the judgment of the courts of the country. But you seek to withdraw it from that revision, and you vote down every proposition that I make to subject this monster to judicial revision and judgment. Your object is to make it a lawless, irresponsible military tyranny. It is that in its provisions; it is that by your votes; it is that, as I will prove in the remarks that I intend to make upon the final passage of the bill, beyond all doubt.

Mr. McDougall. Mr. President, I have regretted the course of remark which has been indulged in by the Senator from Kentucky, and particularly I have regretted to hear him make criticisms upon one of the officers of the General Government who has charge of its law department. That gentleman is not here upon this floor. I do not think that anything he has done since he has been in his office has justified any such assault. He was regarded in Kentucky, from which he comes, as a very good lawyer, and was always considered a good man so far as I have heard him reported. He is not here on this floor to respond to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator will permit me, I will make an explanation. That officer has an audience and speaks to a power from which I am cut off, and he speaks in a language that I never hear, and that is never communicated to me. I speak now in a language and before a tribunal that can reach him in half an hour.

Mr. McDougall. It may be so. I have never yet had occasion on this Senate floor or in the other end of the Capitol, when I had the honor to be there, to make a speech that was heard beyond the Alleghenies, or beyond the Rocky mountains, or across the Sierra Nevada. I speak here to Senators in council on the public affairs of the nation, and I do not make an electioneering speech for California; nor do I hold it to be legitimate to make an electioneering speech for Kentucky. I think Mr. Speed, the Attorney General, who has been animadverted upon, is a very excellent gentleman in his way. I do not know that he is the most illuminated man that ever appeared; I will not say that he has a revelation from on high, as it was said the man from Sweden, who was called Swedenborg, had; but I am told that he is a very excellent lawyer, a very excellent gentleman, and does his best in his office. I dislike this kind of assault upon a Federal officer who is not here. If the gentleman chooses to assail me, or any gentleman on this floor who has a chance to respond to him and be heard as far as Kentucky possibly, by everybody that takes the Congressional Globe, very well.

Now, passing from that matter, I beg leave to differ from the Senator in regard to this amendment. It is only making "confusion worse confounded." The bill is bad enough, God knows; it has faults enough, in my judgment—

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to ask this question of the honorable Senator, with his permission: does he present himself as the champion and the defender here of a man whom he says I have injured?

Mr. McDougall. You spoke of him here where he has no opportunity to reply.

Mr. DAVIS, (to Mr. McDougall.) I merely ask if you, sir, present yourself as his champion and defender.

Mr. McDougall. I will admit that the Senator from Kentucky may be much more conversant with the Attorney General than I am, and I suppose he has been much more conversant with him at least in years past, for my acquaintance with that gentleman is of very recent origin, though I had heard of him by report for many years. The Senator asks if I am his champion. When that gentleman asks me to be his champion and states his cause, possibly I may be. For many years I endeavored to protect the weak and undefended, and I can do it now. I do not know, however, that he requires my defense, certainly he has never solicited it. I merely object to Senators, who can send their messages on the wings of the wind all through the country, saying things here, because they are published at Government expense, which are assaults on persons who are unprotected. I shall always object to that, whether the individual assaulted be upon my side in politics or not. I have no very profound respect for the Attorney General. I think I have probably seen as good lawyers as him in my time, and probably there may be as good in Kentucky. That is not the point; I merely say this is not the way to do things in this Chamber, and is not becoming the dignity of the Senate, in my judgment.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. McDougall. I do not yield.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not ask the Senator to instruct me in my duties here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California is entitled to the floor, and declines to yield.

Mr. McDougall. I object to this amendment. I have acted with the Senator as long as he was trying to get an expression of the sense of the Senate. I wished to have the bill put in such a shape that we might all understand what we were voting upon; for if a fight is to be made, although we are largely in the minority, it may be a long fight. It is very easy to win a quarter race, but it takes one of the Arab stock to win a four-mile race. I am willing to take the chances for the distance. If my horse was entered for a long race I would not mind seeing a fast nag that was only good for a quarter race pass him—a dashing fellow, like the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson,] who would brush over us all; who would not have anything like a Democrat extant on the face of the globe. [Laughter.] It would not scare me a bit if my horse was running solidly and strong, because I know that in the long run he would win.

This amendment would, if adopted, impair the bill. Let us have as good a bill as a bad bill can be. I shall vote against this amendment, because in my judgment it will not improve but will disturb the bill. I intend to support only such amendments as in my judgment are good.

Mr. DAVIS. I merely have to say that the Senator imputes an object to me that I do not entertain; and if he thinks that my amendments were intended to deform the bill, it only proves that he does not comprehend my amendments.

Mr. McDougall. I will ask the Senator whether the same proposition has not been involved in several amendments substantially.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir, not at all. I ask now for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, Kiddle, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Wright—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—87.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Fessenden, Johnson, Nesmith, and Sprague—5.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment to be proposed to the bill itself, the question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from California, [Mr. McDougall,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. McDougall. I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate by any extended remarks, for it is late in the evening; but I desire to say, that it may be understood, and may be understood to have been remarked by me, that I regard this as an opening measure, not of so much consequence as a fact in itself, but for that which it portends. It is the forerunner of a struggle which has yet to come on and be maintained on one side and on the other among the opinions of the people of this country, whose office and business it is from the citizen up to govern and rule; and I call the citizens the first governors, and those who exert power simply their representatives.

The bill itself is unconstitutional, in my judgment. I have said sufficient upon that subject. If constitutional, it is unwise; and ten thousand things might be said to show its utter want of wisdom. It exhibits itself to my mind's eye as simply the result of a great love to express power, having it in immediate possession, without any regard to its ultimate consequences. It is making an extra specialty out of a subject-matter that I thought might have been removed by this time from the consideration of the Senate and House of Representatives and the executive department of the United States, and left to local administration and to the judiciary. Since the time I first had the honor to occupy a place in congressional halls (and that is a great many years ago) this same subject, or some of its adjuncts, has occupied all the time of legislation, or nearly all the time. It has been hardly possible to have any great question of policy heard or considered either in the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States. No matter how grave the questions pressing upon us, all except the appropriation bill had to give way to this mania that has seemed to pervade a party as well as individuals.

A singular question was asked by one of the wise bishops of England: may not communities be insane? He who was thus interrogated inquired in his own thought and considered the question, and was not able to give a good response; but the wise bishop said, "If history write true, communities can be insane;" and so I say parties may be insane; and on this particular subject, if there can be any deduction from past history and the laws that govern States, the laws that govern peoples, from the family up into nations, all this proceeding has been right against the course and law of nature and all past human experience. Those who call themselves the Mosesses and the leaders of the African race in this country, if they could be interpreted well, not by their intentions, but by what will be the necessary results of their action, would seem to have leagued together to be their worst enemies.

This legislation specially for the negro race against those who owned all these broad lands, in favor of them as against our own people, the white men who labor, the effort to make a privileged class of what are called the freedmen, must really tend to their destruction. It will be worse for them than the policy we have pursued as against the Indian tribes has been to the red man. Within my own experience I have seen a tribe of twenty-five thousand dwindle to two hundred and fifty, and I suppose there are not five of them left to-day. This has been the result of the oppression and the advance of the white man; but worse than the oppression and the advance of the white man upon the Indian is this legislation, which seeks to elevate the negro, but only lifts him up that he may fall so profoundly that he will sink into the nether depths.

I claim for myself to be as true a friend of the people of African descent or of mingled blood as any man upon this floor—I think a better friend than the gentlemen from New England who know nothing of them. I would protect them not by over-legislating. Let them know that they have the shield of the Constitution and the laws of Congress, if you please, all of them in their favor to protect them. It is protection by law that makes a freeman or a freedman. All the boy of twenty has is protection, and all our wives and daughters have is protection. They do not make laws. Government establishes rules, and it has always been considered that the wisest element should be brought into government; and those who have written and thought about it from Plato down have always said that the wisest element should be brought into public affairs for the purpose of securing good government.

Now, the only proper condition of the freedman is that he shall be subject to government, the same government that controls me, the same government that controls every Senator and every white man in the United States; and to that government he is bound to yield proper support. There were a great many men in the ancient times, and in what were called republics, who could not cast their votes at elections, and had nothing immediately to do with the affairs of Government. I remember but one republic throughout all history where the people met together; and not all the people then, but only a class. When the wild democracy of Athens met and cast their votes, all of them did not vote. Government, it has always been supposed, should be in the hands of the best and the wisest. It is thought by good thinkers that since the time of our fathers, when all the people probably were fit to be citizens, we have become greatly demoralized by introducing improper elements to act upon the laws in the local and State governments as well as in the Federal Government; and the question has often been asked, are we not getting almost as unfit for free government as those in France, who undertook to maintain a free Government among the French people? No one pretends that the negro population have the education or the information that belongs to the white race. They have not had the opportunity, to say nothing of their possibilities, of which I may take occasion to speak hereafter. Everything that is proposed to be done is inviting them to think that they are not only quite as good as, but a little better than, we with whom they have commingled, or with whom they have lived, belonging to the white races. It is exhibiting itself everywhere in demonstration. All these things tend in the same way.

Now the issue has come. If we are to allow an inferior population to engage in the highest office of the Government, debasing further the standard of the metal which is debased enough already, God knows, let us understand the issue. I know, for one, that nothing but red and white blood courses through my veins. I believe in the Pelasgians, who drove the Egyptians out of Greece, and the Hyperboreans, who became the demigods of that same country, from whom Theseus and Hercules are supposed to have descended, white-haired, great, godlike looking men. I believe something in that Scandinavian race that came from the frozen North, swept the shores of Europe, and settled themselves on the most beautiful islands of the great sea. I believe something in the Saxon and the Celt. But the Numidian, proud and noble as he is said to have been, and the Carthaginian, not of northern, but of high eastern blood, went down, and so did India, and so did the East, and so did Italy, even before the northern barbarians. There is a law of force and there is a law of truth. Who that calls himself of the old Norse ancestry would dare bow himself before those who come up out of central Africa, and acknowledge them as having to do with government? What, sir, they to govern me! God forefend!

Mr. President, we might as well meet this question now, because it is proposed at the present time that this district of country in which our capital is located shall be governed by the African. Under the legislation now proposed, you may in a short time see the people who inhabit the city of Washington and the Senators and Representatives of the people of the United States the subjects of those who have come out of slavery within perhaps two or three years, but who are now to enjoy the elective franchise and carry on government in the District of Columbia. The other House, I understand, has already passed a bill with that view, carrying out the idea of making an inferior race a governing power in this Republic, thus depriving us of the very element out of which we all grow, the soil out of which we are able to produce advised persons, informed men, citizens of a Republic claiming to be able to exercise that highest power, to govern ourselves through the voice of the people. We are the only people that ever achieved success in this. Our motto should be improvement and not demoralization. All these things tend to demoralization, and it may as well be understood now, that never, while I am able to express myself either by word or action, will I commit the great legacy of our fathers, our Constitution, our system of government, to any who are inferior to the properly understood white races. This bill undertakes to make the negro in some respects their superior, as I have said, and gives them favors that the poor white boy in the North cannot get; gives them favors which we never offered to the Indian, whom I hold to be a nobler and far superior race. It makes us their voluntary guardians to see, in the first place, that they have the opportunity to work, and then their guardians to see that they get paid and that they are taken care of, and then we are to take care of them ourselves. I never had anybody to do that for me, even when I was quite a young lad; and from that time until now it has been my office to protect myself; to earn what I could for my own support. This bill confers on the negro race favors that have not been extended to many men on this floor within my own personal knowledge.

I say these things because I desire Senators to give their attention to the whole subject which they have now got upon their shoulders. Hercules multiplied by the majority of the Senate could not carry these propositions and this policy through to any considerable or to any ultimate success. It is not within the power of man to do it, for the question is governed by those relations that govern mankind. That these men are free, I am rejoiced. I have been as great a lover of liberty, and of liberty for their race, as any man who dares call himself its champion, whether he comes from the North or the East, or elsewhere. I understand, at the same time, that we have to maintain our individuality as a race, and we have to employ this inferior race in their proper place. According to the views of many, we should be better off if they did not inhabit any part of this land, better off, if the idea could be realized, if they were placed anywhere else where they might not come in contact with the progress of white civilization. They cannot aid it; they cannot promote it.

The African has ability in a certain way. If he is a genuine African, he is strong of body; like the Indian, quick of sight; like the monkey—I speak not offensively—he has great imitative powers; like birds, he is fond of music; he can be an orator by his command of language, and he can imitate the best orators. I have seen in the sacred desk what were called eloquent clergymen, full Africans. They are capable of discoursing what would be called more eloquently than can be discoursed by any gentleman whom I now see on this floor, myself of course included. The finest musician I ever heard in a wild way I think was an old negro who was called General Jackson, when I was a boy. They understand music, and therefore they are able to understand some of the arts. But as a race you can give me no illustration, from Fred. Douglass all the way through the category, of a single individual of them who is or was a grave, careful, considerate, and high reasoning man. None of them ever gave a thought to philosophy; none of them ever studied, beyond the mere matter of management, anything about government; none of them have achieved success in any field where belongs high intellectuality. These are things that I affirm and dare affirm, because no part of history furnishes any contradiction to what I say.

Some gentlemen who do not know much about these things think they are mere matters of party question to be resolved by a caucus; and here let me say that until recently such things as caucuses by the majority for the purpose of carrying measures have not been known to the Federal Congress. The system is the growth of the last and the present Administration, in this House at least, and I suppose in the other House also. Now we do not come here to deliberate carefully, to counsel each other as to what is best to be done for the Republic, but we come here to organize into cliques, to get men committed to a majority to pass things without consultation with others, thinking that the opposition to the majority may not have a spark of wisdom. They have forgotten a little that text which I think was delivered by King Solomon, and he intended it for just such an occasion as this: "Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend;" and so it may be said that a man sharpeneth the countenance of his adversary, intellectually. It is very possible for me to be instructed by any one of the gentlemen on this floor. I was once instructed by a man who did not know how to read or write. The system of reducing the action of the Senate to that which is agreed upon by party caucuses is a thing I say unknown until the period of the last and the present Administration, within my knowledge of public affairs. Heretofore men in these high places would counsel with each other and talk with each other, but that it should be resolved that on all public measures the majority should act together is a new thing in the Federal Congress.

Mr. CONNESS. Will my colleague permit me a word? I desire to say, as the impression appears to be being made here, and it will go out to the country—it has been repeated by other Senators, I think, than my colleague, that—

Mr. McDougall. I beg pardon. If my colleague wants to say something on this subject, he can reserve his remarks until I have finished mine, and then it will be perfectly proper for him to do so.

Mr. CONNESS. If my colleague will listen to what I mean to say, I think he will be entirely satisfied with the interruption.

Mr. McDougall. Very well.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to say that there has been no caucus of the majority on these measures.

Mr. McDougall. Then my remark does not apply to this particular question. A caucus has been held on many questions, to my knowledge. It may not have been, so far as this is concerned. It is understood by gentlemen who represent opinions in common with me that we can only present our views; that so far as immediate legislation is concerned, they will be inconsequent; and yet it is well that it should be understood that there are persons who do not exactly agree with the majority, and who think that they are doing unwise things, and that they are not building up our great edifice, not adding a stone to it, but even perhaps going to the extent of making its pillars tremble.

It is with the profound conviction that this struggle has come on, and that it is going to be maintained by uninformed men, that I moved the amendment that I have proposed, leaving the matter where I think it belongs, not to legislation, which can only be general in its character, but to administration, which can take charge of it wherever the occasion may occur. That is wiser and better legislation, I think, and it is not obnoxious to any constitutional objection.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Guthrie, Henderson, McDougall, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Wright—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Waite, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Foot, Grimes, Johnson, Kirkwood, Nesmith, Poland, and Riddle—10.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no further amendment be proposed, the question will be on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. DAVIS. I intend to be heard on this bill. I would as soon speak on its passage as on its third reading. I am willing, therefore, to have the question taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and I will make my remarks immediately afterward.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will give way I wish to say that I think it would be unjust to compel the Senator from Kentucky to go on with his remarks to-night. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I would as soon go on to-night as at any time hereafter. ["Go on!"] I suppose gentlemen do not want to extend me the courtesy of an adjournment, and I will not ask them for it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is not altogether a question of courtesy to the Senator from Kentucky, though I suppose we all desire to extend to him that courtesy, but it is somewhat a question of comfort to ourselves. I understand that the Senator intends to make an elaborate argument on the bill, which we shall all be very happy to hear, and it will be more comfortable for us to have him make it to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to adjourn, and debate on the question, except by common consent, is not in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was only about to say that we have wasted the whole afternoon nearly in calling the yeas and nays and offering amendments, and the Senator from Kentucky has given notice that he is going to make a speech. I think we may as well hear it to-night. He says he is ready to go on; he asks no courtesy of the Senate; he does not ask an adjournment; he is as ready to proceed to-night as he will be at any time; and I hope the Senate will consent to sit and hear him to-night.

Mr. McDougall. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he means to call for a vote this evening.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall have a vote this evening.

Mr. McDougall. You seek a vote?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I will proceed to make such observations on this bill as I design to do; and if the Senate will not adjourn I hope they will not make so much noise that I cannot hear myself. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will endeavor to enforce order in the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not care who hears me or who does not hear me; all I want is to be able to hear myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I do feel a peculiar and a deep interest in this measure. My opposition to it I cannot speak. I wish I had the power to give utterance to the feeling of opposition that I entertain toward this measure. It is a measure intended to continue a military despotism, especially in the State of Kentucky. It is a measure intended utterly to abrogate her laws where ever they do not come up to the standard—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend his remarks for a moment until order is restored in the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky give way to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will give way in order that I may move an adjournment. ["Oh, no!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has the floor by the consent of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very well aware that the Senator from Kentucky does not desire to speak this evening, and I understand there is to be no further debate. He desires to speak, and I have it from himself that he expects to make a two hours' speech. I do not feel under obligation to remain here after five o'clock in the evening. It is the long session; we can remain here next summer; it will be no additional cost to the Government; and I do not see that Senators ought to be required to remain here after five o'clock in the afternoon. I am satisfied that there will be no further discussion from what I can understand. Let the Senator make his speech to-morrow, and let us then take the vote; and with that understanding I now move an adjournment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall not adjourn.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope we shall.

Mr. ANTHONY. If I might be allowed to make a suggestion by common consent—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order except by common consent; the motion is to adjourn. ["Consent."]

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest that there should be a general understanding that the vote shall be taken at some particular hour to-morrow. If that can be the general understanding, I think the Senate would prefer to hear the Senator from Kentucky to-morrow; but if there is to be further debate after this, I think we had better sit on and have it now. An understanding such as I suggest has been had repeatedly in the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By common consent the Chair will hear the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have spoken to several gentlemen on this side of the Hall, and I think there is no disposition to continue the debate in opposition to the bill after the speech of the Senator from Kentucky. Whether there will be further debate on the part of the friends of the measure, of course I cannot say.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senate will allow me, I will say that I do not intend to speak for the consumption of time. I do not oppose the bill because of any factious purpose. I oppose it because of my deep and truthful conviction that it is intended to overthrow the liberties of my own State; and being of that opinion, I should be false to myself and false to my State if I did not give utterance to my sentiments of opposition to the measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the result is announced I wish to suggest that I think an understanding can be had which will be satisfactory upon all sides, that the vote shall be taken say at three o'clock to-morrow. That will give the Senator from Kentucky, I presume, as much time as he will desire.

Mr. McDougall. I object to any such arrangement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that the Senator from California does not consent to it, and therefore I cannot propose it as a harmonious thing, and I withdraw any suggestion about it.

The result of the vote was announced to be—yeas 14, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Foster, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, McDougall, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stockton, and Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Fessenden, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Poland, Ramsey, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Yates—14.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I submit myself with as much grace as I can to the judgment of the Senate, and will proceed to make my remarks. I oppose the passage of this measure:

First, because a majority of the Senate exclude Senators from eleven States from their seats for the purpose of securing the passage of this and other measures:

Second, the measure is unconstitutional, because it proposes to invest the Freedmen's Bureau with judicial powers; because it authorizes the President to assign Army officers to the exercise of those judicial powers; because it breaks down the partition of the powers of the Government made by the Constitution, and blends and concentrates in the same hands executive and judicial powers; and because it deprives the citizen of his right to trial by jury in civil cases.

Third, it ought not to pass because it is a scheme devised to practice injustice and oppression upon the white people of the late slaveholding States for the benefit of the free negroes, to engender strife and conflict between the two races, and to prostitute the powers of the Government for the impoverishment and degradation of the white race and the enrichment and exaltation of the negro race.

Fourth, it will produce a profligate, wasteful, and unnecessary expenditure of the public money.

Fifth, it is one of the bold, reckless, and unconstitutional systems of measures devised by the radical party to enable it to hold on to power and office.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the Senator has announced his various propositions, and an interruption just here will not break into his speech materially. I now suggest to Senators that we agree to a vote at three o'clock to-morrow. The Senator from California withdraws any objection to that arrangement, as I understand him, and if this is the consent of the Senate, on that assurance given, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it can be understood that we shall vote at three o'clock to-morrow, I shall not persist in trying to keep the Senate here now. If the Senator from Kentucky will assent to that arrangement, if he will agree not to hold the Senate after three o'clock to-morrow, although it is the wasting of another day, I am willing to accommodate Senators.

Mr. DAVIS. I signify that assent for myself.
Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Kentucky will consent; then I shall not oppose the motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I supposed that when I called the attention of the Senate to the proposition and no Senator objected to it, it was the consent of the Senate. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 24, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a correspondence between the Superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point, and the chief Engineer of the Army of the United States, in regard to certain captured cannon; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a list of all vessels once foreign which have received American registers in the year 1865; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. McCLURG, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the report of the Committee of Claims of the 19th instant, be printed for the use of the members of this House.

MEDICAL STATISTICS.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs consider and report as to the propriety of having compiled for future reference the medical statistics of the Provost Marshal's Bureau of enrollment and draft.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. McCLURG. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of this House be, and the same is hereby, awarded to Lorenzo Sherwood, of Texas, on the evening of the 30th instant, (Tuesday) for the purpose of a lecture on the following subjects, namely:

The exclusive power of Congress over the subject of citizenship and naturalization.

The power of Congress to give effect, by the enactment and enforcement of laws, to all the protective provisions of the Constitution, and to make the principle of protection practically coextensive with citizenship.

The positive constitutional interdiction upon the power of Congress, and upon the Legislatures of the respective States, to subvert or impair natural rights.

The power of Congress to compel the enforcement and maintenance of republican government in every State, making the protective features of the Constitution the definition and test of what is republican government.

The floor of the House to be occupied by such persons only as are privileged during the time of session.

Mr. MARSHALL. I object.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I demand the regular order of business.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the consideration of the following joint resolution reported by the joint committee on reconstruction:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE — Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. LE BLOND to refer the joint resolution and pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] who is entitled to the floor is not in his seat.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move that the pending resolution and amendments be recommended to the committee on reconstruction, with instructions to report an amendment to the Constitution which shall, first, apportion direct taxes among the States according to property in each; and which shall, second, apportion Representatives among the States on the basis of adult male voters who may be citizens of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, since the adjournment last evening I have devoted some time to the consideration of the question now before the House. The Constitution provides that—

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."—Constitution, art. 1, sec. 2.

It is well understood that this clause was the result of a compromise among the framers of the Constitution, and like most compromises, did not settle any fundamental and unalterable principle of free government. It undertook to regulate two subjects, the basis of representation in Congress and the Electoral College, and the distribution of direct taxes among the States.

But the scheme of imposing direct taxes on population rather than on property; of requiring many persons with little property to pay a greater amount of taxes than fewer persons with more property, has been acknowledged so universally odious and unjust that this mode of taxation has rarely ever been adopted by the nation, and perhaps not at all by the States.

There never has been a time when the basis of representation has not been a subject of just complaint among the people of the free States. A brief examination will readily show that it was wrong in principle, and unjust in practical results.

The rule which gave representation to three fifths of the slave population, (for the "three fifths of all other persons" mentioned in the Constitution means slaves,) was purely arbitrary, the result of compromise, and not of fixed political principles, or of any standard of abstract justice. If slavery was a just element of political strength, I know of no rule which could properly divide it into "fractional quantities." If it was not a just element of political strength I know of no rule which could properly give it "fractional power."

But the basis of representation was unjust in practical results, because it gave to chattel slavery political power—a power accorded to no other species of property—thus making what the slave States regarded as wealth an element of political strength. Now let us see how this has operated. I find these facts stated:

"In 1790 the ratio of representation was one Representative to every thirty-three thousand of the representative population. Now it is one Representative for every one hundred and twenty-seven thousand. On the 23d of May, 1850, the principle was established, for the first time, of limiting the number of Representatives, and thus relieving Congress of the necessity of fixing every ten years the number of members of which the House should consist. This law established the number of Representatives at two hundred and thirty-three, who were to be apportioned among the several States, respectively, by dividing the number of the representative population of the States by the number 233, and the product of this division was to be the ratio of representation. In the slave States three fifths of the slaves were added to the white class to preserve the balance of power. This law of May, 1850, was changed after the apportionment by another law, passed on March 4, 1862. This increased the number of Representatives to two hundred and forty-one, several of the States gaining one member by the change."

This representation was apportioned among the several States having free and slave population thus:

The free colored population of the States in 1860 was 476,562, making a total of 31,149,965.

From this it will be seen that New Hampshire, with a white population of 325,579, has but three Representatives, while Louisiana, with a white population of 357,629, had five. California, with a white population of 323,177, has but three Representatives, while Mississippi, with a similar population of 353,901, had five. In South Carolina 72,847 white persons had one Representative, while the ratio of representation is one for 127,000 persons.

Under this mode of apportionment the late slave States had eighteen Representatives by the census of 1860 more than their just share, if based on free population.

The whole political power of Ohio was counterbalanced by slave representation. It was equal to two thirds of all the representation from New England.

In South Carolina 14,569 votes carried as much political power as 25,400 votes in the free States.

I do not now complain that our fathers, in a spirit of compromise more liberal than just, made these concessions to slavery. I do not stand here to doubt their patriotism or impugn their wisdom. For three quarters of a century the people of the North did faithfully abide by the bond as written by the framers of the Constitution. They did more. Although the Constitution went into effect, as all concurrent history proves, with the expectation that slavery would soon die out forever, and was by no means to be extended, yet it was permitted to curse new acquisitions of territory and States, greater in extent than all the original thirteen, and pari passu, the political power of slavery expanding grew with the national growth and strengthened with its strength. But finally slavery, foiled in its purpose of imperial dominion, appealed to the arbitrament of the sword to destroy the nation, and in turn itself was overthrown.

And now with universal freedom, in name at least, the Constitution and the people of the rebel States present new aspects and new elements of political strength.

In apportioning Representatives in Congress and the power of the States in the Electoral College, we cease to count three fifths of the late slave population and count it all as the Constitution now stands. Since slavery is abolished the Constitution has effect precisely as though it read—

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, [of population, including all both white and black,] except Indians not taxed."

The effect of this will be, so soon as lawful State governments are created in the rebel States, to largely increase their representation in Congress and the Electoral College. The slave population by the census of 1860 was 3,950,581. Three fifths of this, or 2,370,318, has heretofore entered into the basis of representation. Now, the additional 1,580,213, is to be added to that basis. This will give ten additional Representatives to the late slave States, in all twenty-eight more than their just proportion upon a basis excluding the late slaves.

But the startling injustice of the existing mode of apportionment will be apparent by some additional considerations, which I find thus stated:

"For example, let us compare some of the southern States with those of the northern States which come somewhat near them in population on the basis of the last census. If we take the whole population of each State as the number which measures the right of representation, and suppose that the white men alone of the southern States cast the votes of the States, a brief calculation will show that every hundred of the white inhabitants of South Carolina will have as much power through their Representatives as two hundred and forty of the people of Iowa; one hundred white men in Mississippi will equal two hundred and twenty-three men in Wisconsin; one hundred white men in Louisiana will equal one hundred and ninety-eight in Maine; one hundred white men in Alabama will equal one hundred and eighty-three in Connecticut; and one hundred white men in Alabama and Louisiana together will equal one hundred and eighty-nine in Indiana. It is therefore apparent that if, as the Constitution requires, the colored men of the South are all counted in to measure the right of representation, and are then all disfranchised, this must operate a proportional disfranchisement of the people of the North and West. How long can it be believed that this inequality will be endured? On what right or reason does it rest? If it be that the colored race of the South are all wholly disfranchised because wholly unfit for the right of suffrage, is it also true that the white voters of South Carolina are about two and a half times better fitted to exercise this right wisely and patriotically than the people of Iowa?"

If this injustice can be tolerated and perpetuated, and the late rebel States shall soon be admitted to representation, they will enjoy as the reward of their perfidy and treason increased political power. This will reward traitors with a liberal premium for treason. I am unwilling that this gross inequality should continue, so that when the Representatives of South Carolina return to these Halls, each rebel voter by them represented will enjoy a political power more than double that of every loyal voter of my district.

Sir, I would not allow this additional number of ten Representatives to the late slave States as the reward of treason. But I would strike down the political power heretofore wielded by the eighteen Representatives of slavery, and make the political power of every voter precisely equal all over the land.

For one, I demand that the Constitution shall be so amended as that representation shall be based on citizens of the United States who may be male adult voters.

I may be permitted to say a few words by way of explanation before I present some of the reasons which seem to me to justify the proposed amendment. It does not propose to extend the right of suffrage to or withhold it from any class of people.

It does not propose to settle or interfere with the controverted question whether Congress, under the Constitution as it now is, may determine who can or cannot vote for Representatives. It does not propose to disturb the commonly received construction of the Constitution which leaves to the States the right to determine who shall or shall not be voters.

It does not propose to disturb or impair the undoubted power of Congress and the President to determine whether a State government is republican in form, and if not to interpose and guaranty such government.

All these questions are left untouched, to be decided when other amendments or laws involving them may be proposed for our action.

It does propose, what no other amendment submitted to this House can effect, that one voter in South Carolina shall have precisely as much political power as one voter in Ohio, for all purposes of representation in Congress. It has the crowning merit of a perfect representative democracy, that for all purposes of representation every voter in this broad land of ours is equally potential in its councils.

I have not stopped to inquire as the ground of my opinions how it would for the present affect this State or that, but I have read in it that ideal of perfection in government which makes every voter equal in power.

I will read it as introduced by my distinguished colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK.] It is in these words:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number of male citizens [of the United States] over twenty-one years of age, having the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The Congress, at their first session after the ratification of this amendment by the required number of States, shall provide by law for the actual enumeration of such voters; and such actual enumeration shall be separately made in a general census of the population of all the States within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as the Congress may by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every hundred thousand of actual population, but each State shall have at least one Representative.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I am free to concede that constitutional amendments should not be hastily made, and never but for adequate reasons, upon the gravest and most mature consideration.

But if ever there could be a time for making fundamental changes in our organic law and grafting on it irreversible guarantees, that time is now. The events of the past four years demonstrate their necessity, and our security for the future imperatively demands them at our hands. The great events which have transpired, and the altered circumstances that surround us, admonish us that we will be recreant to our trusts if we fail to inscribe justice on the Constitution, and fortify it against the encroachments of treason, so that it shall be eternal. One of the elements of our past misfortunes, and which gave power for evil to the enemies who assailed us in this temple, was unequal and unjust representation—political power wielded by a dominant class, augmented by concessions on behalf of a disfranchised and servile race, insultingly declared almost in the very citadel of national justice as having no rights which a white man was bound to respect. By this amendment we strike down the iniquity of one class wielding political power for another, and arrogant because in the exercise of unjust power. The three-fifths representation of the Constitution was a concession to slavery. Slavery, the reason of the rule, having ceased, the rule itself should cease. It does cease by the terms of the Constitution, but with renewed power for evil.

The Constitution was not made in view of or for the condition of affairs which we now witness. When it was made the free population, without regard to color, by the laws of every State except perhaps one, enjoyed the elective franchise. If slavery had been abolished then almost the whole free population would have been voters. But now, in every State of the South the colored race is denied all political rights. They are declared by the laws of the States to be unfit to exercise political privileges. Each State enjoys the political right of deciding for itself who shall and who shall not vote. The amendment under consideration does not propose to disturb the enjoyment of that right.

But it does affirm that one class of men shall not have political power on behalf of a race declared by their laws unfit to exercise it.

It has been urged, that if this amendment be adopted, the States will extend the elective franchise for the purpose of gaining additional representation, and that ultimately the States will extend it to the colored population. But no gentleman yet has proposed to prohibit the States from the exercise of this, as the laws now stand their undoubted constitutional right. No one has suggested that the rights of the States in this respect should be abridged. And if the States choose to extend the elective franchise it is not our duty to prohibit it. If they do so, it will be because they regard it as just and safe in the hands of people capable of exercising it. If they do not, it will be because they regard the disfranchised class as unsafe depositaries of political power. If any class is unfit to be an element of political strength, it is unjust to clothe a favored class with political power on its behalf. Whatever protection it demands should be intrusted equally to all the Representatives of the people.

But the chairman of the committee on reconstruction [Mr. STEVENS] submits for our consideration, in lieu of the amendment proposed by my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] a substitute in these words:

ARTICLE.—Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

The substantial differences are these: one makes citizens who are adult male voters the basis of representation, the other the whole population except Indians not taxed, and persons of that race or color which may not enjoy equal or impartial suffrage.

Now, if in each State the women, children, and unnaturalized foreigners bore exactly the same relative proportion to voters, then there would be no practical difference in the result of the two proposed amendments. The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] insists that women, children, and unnaturalized foreigners shall, with the voters of their class, form the basis of representation, mainly because in some States the female population is relatively in excess of the male, and especially in New England, whose male population is reduced by emigration to the West. He fears a reduction in the political power of New England; but I think it has been demonstrated that his facts are somewhat fanciful, and his figures are still more fictitious. So, at least, I understand the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] whose elaborate investigations given to this House are full of interest and value.

If no change shall be made in the Constitution, the political power of all the loyal States will be relatively diminished by the increased power now to be given to the late slave States.

Either of the two proposed amendments will increase the relative representation and power of the loyal States; but the amendment of the chairman of the committee on reconstruction, [Mr. STEVENS,] while it is preferable to the Constitution as it now is, perpetuates the very political evil which to some extent it remedies. It gives representation to women, children, and unnaturalized foreigners, all declared by the laws of the States unsafe or unnecessary depositaries of political power. It disregards the fundamental idea of all just representation, that every voter should be equal in political power all over the Union.

If in any State there shall be a large influx of unnaturalized foreigners, as in the great cities of the East, that State will gain additional representation therefrom. If in any State there shall be an excess of women or children, or both, these will give additional representation and political power.

The dominions of Brigham Young, if incorporated in the Union, would become the paradise of politicians, rich in unequal political power, because of the multitudinous wives and innumerable children of the Saints of Utah.

With what grace can we say to the South, "You shall have no representation for freedmen not enfranchised," while we insist upon representation for aliens and women and children not enfranchised?

If the representation of unenfranchised freedmen may be safely intrusted to all the Representatives of the nation, may not that of aliens and women and children be equally so?

If it is unjust to give local political power to the South by reason of her unenfranchised freedmen, is it not unfair to give similar power by reason of unenfranchised aliens elsewhere? I know it may be said that one reason for denying representation on behalf of unenfranchised freedmen is to encourage the South to educate and qualify all her people not only to become useful citizens but competent voters. This is but one element of consideration with those who urge it. The reason which conclusively justifies it is that a people declared by law, if in fact unprepared for suffrage, should not be represented as an element of power by those interested in forever keeping them unprepared. But children never can be qualified and competent depositaries of political power, and therefore should not enter into the basis of representation. It never has been deemed necessary for the protection of females that they should be regarded as an element of political power, and hence they should not be an element of representation. If the necessity shall come, or if our sense of justice should so change as to enfranchise adult females, it will be time enough then to make them a basis of representation.

While my own State and the West generally would certainly gain political power by the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] I do not for that reason support it. If gentlemen will overlook fundamental principles of right, and be guided by considerations of temporary expediency or power, constitutional amendments can never be made. Some concessions of opinion must be made from the East as well as from the West to insure success. It is said to be one of our political maxims that there should be no taxation without representation. But it is equally an unalterable maxim of political justice that representation should not be based on property but people, and that taxation is controlled not by the weight of property, but by people wielding political power.

But women, children, and generally aliens, wield no political power, and are therefore not elements to be considered in representation, except as every Representative wields power for all of these unenfranchised classes.

While I indorse the amendment of my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] so far as it goes, I may suggest a verbal alteration to make it more certain. After the word "citizens" it should contain the words "of the United States."

And now, while we are amending the Constitution in this respect, it will be well if it be well done not only in regard to representation but in relation to direct taxes.

The Constitution now apportions direct taxes among the States not according to property but on the basis of population.

This, too, was the result of a compromise. The South demanded representation for slavery, and the North in turn demanded that direct taxes should follow the same basis. The South enjoyed the benefit of slave representation, but managed to escape taxation based on slavery.

The reason for thus ingrafting on the Constitution this unequal mode of apportioning taxes among the States has now passed away, and with it the mode itself should pass away.

Both the amendments under consideration propose to leave this feature of the Constitution unchanged.

Direct taxes include a tax on persons and a tax on lands.

A tax upon population is alike odious and unjust, and the possibility of imposing it should be speedily and forever prohibited by the Constitution. Yet, as the Constitution now stands, such tax may be apportioned among the several States.

I do not suppose it probable that any direct tax will be levied or apportioned among the several States—certainly not now. But we are making constitutional law not merely for to-day but for all time. If it is of importance to preserve or have a constitutional provision on the subject, it should be based on principles of justice. All will agree that property, not population, is the true basis of taxation. Let us protect industry, guard labor from taxation, impose no burdens on the skill or labor of the artisan, the mechanic, the producer, which can possibly be avoided, for these cripple the energies and restrain the prosperity of the people. Let the capital, the wealth of the nation, bear the burdens of taxation, distributed in equal and just proportions, and the heavy debt of the war will be removed in less than a generation.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will my colleague now yield to me?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, it is due to myself, and to nobody else, that I should say that in making the suggestions I am about to make, I make them with extreme reluctance, on account of the deference that I feel for the distinguished committee that has reported the subject-matter now before the House. I think I would not be amenable to be accused of an affectation of modesty in saying that I have fifteen times as much respect for the opinions of that committee as for my own; and yet, in the way of suggestion, I venture to make some remarks, and as a part of those remarks, permit me to send to the Clerk to be read a proposed amendment which I drew up, I acknowledge, before I had carefully read the amendment of my distinguished colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and which I am gratified to find corresponds almost identically, if not exactly identically, with his proposed amendment.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the numbers of male citizens of the United States therein above the age of twenty-one years having the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, and direct taxes shall be apportioned among such States according to the value of all property therein.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, the following are the suggestions which I make—make doubtfully, but still make—as objections to the report of the committee on reconstruction:

1. It contemplates and provides for, and in that way, taken by itself, authorizes the States to wholly disfranchise entire races of its people, and that, too, whether that race be white or black, Saxon, Celtic, or Caucasian, and without regard to their numbers or proportion to the entire population of the State.

2. It is a declaration made in the Constitution of the only great and free Republic in the world that it is permissible and right to deny to the races of men all their political rights, and that it is permissible to make them the hewers of wood and drawers of water, the mud-sills of society, provided only you do not ask to have these disfranchised races represented in that Government, provided you wholly ignore them in the State. The moral teaching of the clause offends the free and just spirit of the age, violates the foundation principle of our own Government, and is intrinsically wrong.

3. The clause, by being inserted into the Constitution, and being made the companion of its other clauses, thereby construes and gives new meanings to those other clauses; and it thus lets down and spoils the free spirit and sense of the Constitution. Associated with that clause relating to the States being "republican," it makes it read thus: "The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," provided, however, that a government shall be deemed to be republican when whole races of its people are wholly disfranchised, unrepresented, and ignored.

And my distinguished and able friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] will, as a lawyer, fully understand how it does this when I quote the legal maxim, "Noscitur a sociis."

Mr. CONKLING. As the gentleman has referred to me, will he permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the gentleman mean the House to understand that, with or without the proposed amendment, there is any doubt of the political or legislative power of a State to say that certain persons, although they constitute a race, shall not vote? And does he mean to say, historically or legally, that from the foundation of the Government to the present time every State has exercised undisputed sway over that whole question?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, the question that is asked by my friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] is not only an exceedingly pertinent one, but it is forcible, and put forcibly, and deserves to be met and answered in the same way. And I reply, first, by saying that it has been doubted that under that clause of the Constitution you can disfranchise races. And I say to my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] that that doubt has found form, force, and volume in the ablest work in America on the criminal law of the country. I allude to Bishop on Crimes.

Mr. STEVENS. May I ask the gentleman whether Bishop does not say that the governments of the southern States, and their action heretofore upon that subject, have not been by common consent regarded as republican and constitutional?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Bishop says, in substance—I do not give the words of the text—that the contemporaneous history of that constitutional power, and the practice under it, have received an interpretation perhaps equivalent to that suggested by the distinguished chairman of the joint committee, [Mr. STEVENS.] But I say, moreover, that Bishop lays it down in his notes, and perhaps also in his text, as in contravention of the true sense and spirit of that clause of the Constitution, and that it was a construction which would be better honored in the breach than in the observance.

Now, I reply further to my distinguished friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] that neither in Bishop, nor in contemporaneous history, nor in any other place, is there to be found a constitutional authorization, such as we are here called upon to adopt, of the disfranchisement of races of men without regard to the magnitude of their number or their political status in the Union. I admit that races, or fractions of races at least, have been disfranchised under the Constitution. But let it be remembered that that disfranchisement was when the race was enslaved; and the Constitution has received its construction in the black light—pardon the paradox—in the black light of slavery.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to interfere with the gentleman's argument, and I will refrain from putting another question, unless he will consent.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will hear the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I will ask the gentleman how he disposes of the fact that under the Constitution as it is, and as it will be with this amendment ingrafted upon it, all the States of this Union have been permitted from the outset, with the acquiescence of Congress, the acquiescence of the Supreme Court, and I borrow a phrase of James Madison when I say "with the universal acquiescence of the American people," to say to persons of a certain race, "not only shall you be without political right, without civil right, without the elective franchise, without one attribute, prerogative, or immunity, politically, but in addition to that, by virtue of State sovereignty, we rob you of everything of natural right; we strip you of every immunity which belongs to humanity itself." I want to know how the gentleman disposes of the fact that this power is in the Constitution now, a greater power, a far greater power, and always undisputed, than that which he fears may exist if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I might, if it were not unworthy of the occasion—for we are in the midst of one of the greatest occasions of the country, when we are attempting to make its organic law—I might, if it were not unworthy of the occasion, ask my distinguished friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] whether he to-day supposes that the construction which he has just stated has been given to our Constitution is a just construction which he invites the courts to give to it in the future. I say, here, in my obscure place in the American Congress, that this construction, however sanctified for seventy years, is not in accordance with the enlightened sense and spirit of the Constitution as your fathers made it, and I thought a better judicial day had now begun to dawn upon the Republic. I had hoped that the judiciary of the Government would begin to look at the Constitution in the light of the Declaration of Independence, which said, and as truly as gloriously, that "all men are created equal."

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. I abhor the so-called "compromises of the Constitution" on the subject of slavery—I do not say it now for the first time—as much as my friend from Ohio; but does he mean to say that, under the Constitution as it unfortunately was, the fugitive slave law of 1793 was not constitutional?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Well, Mr. Speaker, my distinguished friend is a very good strategist as well as a good lawyer. His inquiry indicates, I think, an anxiety that I should discuss something which is not before the House rather than what is.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I withdraw the remark.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I would answer it with the utmost pleasure, but really (on account of my dullness, I suppose) I do not perceive now the application of the question to what I am talking about.

Mr. CONKLING. It is simply an illustration of what I was asking.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I must now resume, Mr. Speaker, the line of remark which I was pursuing: for I intended to occupy but ten minutes, and I have already exceeded that limit. Before resuming, however, let me remark further, in reference to the suggestions which have been made, that even under the constructions which have been given to the Constitution heretofore, it has never been held, so far as I know, that it is within the power of the States ad libitum to disfranchise races as such; and this, I think, or at least fear, will be the effect of the clause as reported by the committee; it will, I apprehend, be construed as giving authority to the States to disfranchise races as such at pleasure, and that without regard to color.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment for a suggestion?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to make a single suggestion, without entering into the debate.

The constructions to which the gentlemen from the committee have referred were unquestionably right, being founded upon an express provision of the Constitution, and based upon the fact that four millions, or an eighth part, of the people were slaves. Now, the Constitution has been changed in that respect; that basis has been removed; there is now no authority for such constructions; and the question is, shall we, by a constitutional amendment, re-establish that power which has come to an end by virtue of the abolition of slavery?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I am obliged to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] for his suggestion, which is entirely in harmony with the argument I was endeavoring to present, and will now resume.

4. The report of the committee imposes no adequate restraint upon this disfranchisement of races and creation of oligarchies in the States, because after a race is disfranchised in a State it gives to one vote cast in such State by the ruling race just the same power as a vote has in a State where no one is disfranchised.

5. These words of the amendment, to wit, "denied or abridged on account of color," admit of dangerous construction and also of an evasion of the avowed intent of the committee. Thus, for example, the African race may in fact be disfranchised in the States, and yet enumerated as part of the basis of representation, by means of a provision disfranchising all who were slaves, or all whose ancestors were slaves. I may be wrong in this; that might, I admit, be held by the courts to be a mere evasion; but still it is, to say the least, doubtful whether the clause as reported might not thus be evaded. Or the provision may be evaded in the ways so ably stated yesterday by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES.]

6. The pending proposition of the committee is a radical departure from the principles of representative republican government, in this, that it does not provide for nor secure the absolute political equality of the people, or, relatively, of the States. It does not secure to each vote throughout the Government absolute equality in its governing force. It, for example, permits twenty-five thousand votes in New York city to elect two members of Congress, provided one half of its population should happen to be foreigners unnaturalized and not electors of the State, whom the law deems unfit to vote; whereas twenty-five thousand votes in Ohio would elect but one member of Congress, provided her citizens were all Americans instead of foreigners.

Mr. CONKLING. Has not that always been so under the Constitution?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. But we are now endeavoring to amend the Constitution. I was just about to remark that the clause of the Constitution to which this is an amendment does the same thing; but then this clause was one of the "compromises of the Constitution," and was never, I think, the best thing that could have been adopted.

Mr. CONKLING. That was no compromise; the only compromise was in regard to slaves.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The gentleman may be right; but I have a different impression. I favor the amendment I have suggested—

1. Because it holds out to all the States the inducement of increased Federal power as a reward for admitting to the rights of local citizenship all men. It invites them to base their institutions upon manhood; and yet it leaves to the States, as now, the regulation of the matter as to who shall be electors in the States.

2. It approximates more nearly than any other plan to the attainment of that eminent justice of counting every man as part of the foundation of your Government whom you may compel to fight for your Government; and it invites the States to adjudge every one whom the law deems fit to bear arms for his country also fit to be counted as an elector of his country. This is done by making the basis of representation nearly the same relatively as that part of society which is capable of bearing arms.

3. It bases the whole structure of the Federal Government upon its own citizenship; and thus in substance retains in its own hands, and away from the States, the stupendous power of determining what shall be the basis of representation upon which the United States shall rest. It does not permit a State to augment, relatively, its Federal power by making men electors of the State whom the United States does not deem fit to be citizens of the United States. This it does by not counting for purposes of apportionment men not citizens of the United States.

4. It is less complex, less liable to be evaded or dangerously construed, than that reported by the committee, and is in itself equal and just.

5. I think it is the one for which the public mind has become prepared and has approved; and which is, therefore, most likely to be ratified this year.

6. It prevents a race as between the States for cheapening the elective franchise by giving it to persons to whom experience has shown it not to be best to give it. This it does by confining representation to adult males.

7. It apportions direct taxes among the States in proportion to the ability of the people to pay them, and to the amount of property in such States protected by the Government. And this is the just principle of apportionment of taxation.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman propose what he has read as an amendment?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I merely read it as a part of my speech. Have I the right to offer it as an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It has been decided that when a gentleman has yielded the floor it can only be for explanation, and not for amendment.

Mr. PIKE obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. ELIOT. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following amendment:

Amend the instructions so as to read as follows: Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed; and the elective franchise shall not be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color.

There was no objection, and the amendment was received.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, when the resolution was offered by the committee, and the amendment was proposed which has been the subject of discussion for two or three days, I was very much inclined to lend it my favor because of one consideration, that by the operation of that amendment we should have incorporated into our organic law what would be a great improvement on the past. There is no doubt in my mind on that point. But, after considering the language of the amendment, I am frank to say that I cannot bring myself to record my vote in its favor, and without going into any protracted discussion I shall proceed to state distinctly the grounds of my objection.

First, the amendment as it is now reported from the committee is objectionable to my mind because it admits by implication that a State has the right to disfranchise large masses of its citizens. I know perfectly well that the power to do so has been exercised; that States have exercised the power of disfranchisement and abridging the rights of suffrage because of race or color; but no man can show that in that Constitution which the fathers made, and under which we have lived, the right is recognized in any State to disfranchise large masses of its citizens because of race. And I do not want now, at this day, that the Congress of the United States, for the purpose of effecting a practical good, shall put into the Constitution of the land any language which would seem to recognize that right. I think this does so, because it says distinctly, if you shall disfranchise, then the race or color operated against shall not be counted in the basis of representation; thus impliedly saying that States may disfranchise because of race or color if they are content to pay the penalty; that they may disfranchise men of color if they are content to have them excluded from the basis of representation.

I do not think that is right. I think we are undertaking to serve God and Mankind. I think we are tampering with political sin; and I think we have no more right to do that than to commit moral sin. I therefore desire, if this shall become the law, it shall be so amended that it shall state in distinct language the political principle which my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] firmly believes, as well as I do, to be right.

The next objection I have to the amendment is this, that it enables a State, consistently with its provisions, by making the right to vote depend upon a property qualification, to exclude large classes of men of both races. A State may legislate in such way as to be in fact an oligarchy, and not a republican State. South Carolina may legislate so as to provide that no man shall have the right to vote unless he possesses an annual income of $1,000, and holds real estate to the amount of five hundred acres.

Every one sees that that would exclude multitudes of all classes of citizens, making the State no longer republican but oligarchical. Yet gentlemen say that under the Constitution Congress is bound to see to it that each State shall have a republican form of government.

The third objection I have to this amendment is that it controls by implication that power, because, while the Constitution now says that Congress shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government, this amendment as reported by the committee admits by implication that, although a State may so legislate as to exclude these multitudes of men, not on account of race or color, but on account of property, yet, nevertheless, she would have a republican form of government, and that Congress will not and ought not to interfere.

Now, sir, I have been in the hope that in the course of this discussion, these difficulties which have occurred to me would be met and obviated. I confess I have not heard them answered; and for the reasons I have briefly stated I shall be compelled to vote against the proposition as it now stands reported from the committee. The amendment which I propose will commend itself to the judgment of the House, as I believe, as both radical and right, if any amendment ought to be made, and while I do not say that I will consent to no other amendment, I believe that this as offered by me substantially effects the change which should be made in our organic law.

Mr. PIKE resumed the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask if it is in order now to move to strike out the instruction offered by my colleague and substitute another instruction.

The SPEAKER. If it is only to amend the amendment last offered it can be received under the rule—to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] and insert something in its stead.

Mr. SCHENCK. I then move to amend by striking out the whole of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and inserting the following:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of each House concurring), That the following be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of such Legislatures, shall become a part of the said Constitution, in place of the third paragraph of the second section of the first article, to wit:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number of male citizens of the United States over twenty-one years of age having the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The Congress, at their first session after the ratification of this amendment by the required number of States, shall provide by law for the actual enumeration of such voters; and such actual enumeration shall be separately made in a general census of the population of all the States within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as the Congress may by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every one hundred and twenty-five thousand of actual population, but each State shall have at least one Representative.

Mr. PIKE again resumed the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. PIKE. I have but a word or two to say; I will yield after I have spoken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will regard that as agreed upon.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take any part in this debate; but as I offered a resolution on the assembling of the House after the holidays, which expresses the idea contained in this resolution proposed by the committee, and as upon reflection I have come to the conclusion that that resolution does not accomplish the purpose I intended, and I therefore prefer the basis indicated by the resolution just offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] I desire briefly to give my reasons for changing my opinion.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, the only object of embodying our legislation in the Constitution in the form of an amendment is permanency. Otherwise, at the present juncture of affairs, we could get on and accomplish the purposes we have in view by ordinary congressional legislation. But as that is not irreversible, we prefer going through the proper formula and setting in operation the cumbersome machinery necessary to a constitutional amendment, that it may be far-reaching in its effects, and accomplish our purpose in the next generation as well as in this.

Now, what are these purposes we wish to accomplish? Of course there are but two. One is to lessen the political power of the South; the other is to protect the colored population of the country. I know of no other objects to be accomplished by a constitutional amendment.

I am free to say that with the first of these purposes I have but comparatively little sympathy. I have the honor to represent a district which for the future will be much more intimately connected by social ties and by commercial relations with the South than with the western sections of the country. And it so happens now that my district produces nothing, grows nothing, manufactures nothing that goes west of the mountains, except it may be an occasional dry codfish, and that I see gentlemen here from that section anxious to get rid of by abolishing fishing bounties. [Laughter.] It is true that we now send an emigration westward; but under the changed aspect of affairs, when present disturbances shall be composed, that will probably go southward instead. There are many articles that my district will produce for southern consumption, and their rude agriculture will as heretofore furnish abundant employment for our tonnage. So that after a generation shall have passed—a generation which I hope and trust will be punished amply and fully for the great offenses it has committed against this Government—after a generation has passed, and the passions of men have subsided, it would hardly be good statesmanship for me to wish to leave a constitutional amendment in operation that shall strike at and cripple the energies of a section from which, under the happy auspices of freedom to all, we have so much to expect.

With the other purpose to be accomplished by a constitutional amendment I have full sympathy. It is the only purpose for which at the present time I will support an amendment with regard to representation; and that is, to protect the colored population of the South.

Now, if it be necessary to arm the colored people with the ballot in order to enable them to defend the freedom we have just given them, it would be best to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, or some similar amendment, which shall in proper and fitting terms do the very thing it is intended to accomplish. But it is said with great force, and I have no doubt quite correctly, that no amendment of that character can pass, and that it is useless to submit such a one to the States when it is sure of rejection. Yielding that point, half-way measures are to be adopted, something in the nature of dodges are to be incorporated into the Constitution, and the question is narrowed down to the consideration of what kind of a one we shall put in.

Now, I have not heard the remarks made this morning, but yesterday various reasons were given very forcibly—some by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] and some by other gentlemen—why, if this constitutional amendment should be adopted, our purpose would not be accomplished; and that purpose is, as I understand it, simply to coerce the States into giving, what we will not do directly, the ballot to the colored population of the South. Those reasons were forcible, and, as far as I have heard, unanswerable. I may add another, and I do it with all due deference to the superior wisdom of the gentlemen of the joint committee, and that is this: suppose this constitutional amendment in full force, and a State should provide that the right of suffrage should not be exercised by any person who had been a slave, or who was the descendant of a slave, whatever his race or color. I submit that it is a serious matter of doubt whether or not that simple provision would not be sufficient to defeat this constitutional amendment which we here so laboriously enact and submit to the States.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PIKE. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask the gentleman to explain this to the House. The amendment which we are proposing is not to take effect in Greece or Rome, or anywhere where anybody besides Africans were held as slaves. It is to operate in this country, where one race and only one has been held in servitude. Now, I ask the gentleman as a lawyer, reading the amendment, as all amendments must be read, in the light of surrounding circumstances, whether there would be place enough for a dove to put down the sole of her foot upon to give the idea that any one would be shut out by such legislation as he speaks of except men of African descent, the negro race? And if this be so, I ask him of what importance, practically, is his criticism?

Mr. PIKE. I understand perfectly the intention of the distinguished gentleman from New York in pressing this amendment. I also understand, and this is my reply to him, that in no State in the South has slavery been confined to any one race. So far as I am acquainted with their statutes, in no State has slavery been confined to the African race. I know of no slave statute, and I have examined the matter with some care, which says that Africans alone shall be slaves. So much for race. As to color, it was a common thing throughout the whole South to advertise runaway slaves as having light hair and blue eyes and all the indications of the Caucasian race, and "passing themselves off for white men." I say further to the honorable gentleman from New York, that well-authenticated instances exist in every slave State where men of Caucasian descent, of Anglo-Saxon blood, have been confined in slavery, and they and their posterity held as slaves. So that not only free blacks were found everywhere, but white slaves also abounded.

Now, one word further. Let me put another case.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the gentleman passes from that point I would like a little information. I do not wish to press it if the gentleman has any objection.

Mr. PIKE. I do not care to have a speech injected into my remarks. I therefore decline to yield.

There is one other proposition that I have not heard suggested. Suppose a State should adopt an educational qualification, and then not do, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] says, deny to a race or persons of a particular color this educational privilege—for that would be a law upon the statute-book that we could take advantage of here—but suppose that after adopting this educational qualification, it should fail to provide that these people whom we now know to be ignorant, shall hereafter be educated, should simply let them severally alone. Or suppose that they interpose such restrictions by indirect laws as to practically prevent them from being educated. Then what becomes of the constitutional amendment? I submit that proposition with all due respect to those gentlemen who have this in charge.

Well, then, if this amendment, proposed as a half-way measure, and for the purpose of accomplishing the two objects that we will not try to accomplish directly, fails to bring about either of the purposes which it is desirable to compass, why should this House give it a sanction? If we are to have a dodge, let us at least have one that will hold water when wanted for use.

As to the other proposition, I know that there are objections to the basis proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] Some of those objections have been very ably and properly stated here. But if such a proposition be sent back to the joint committee, I have no doubt that many of those objections would be removed. One objection, in my judgment, is not well taken; it is the objection that if representation be based upon suffrage there would be undue measures taken in the various States to enlarge the basis of suffrage for the purpose of increasing their representation here. In other words, the States that now have restricted suffrage would adopt universal suffrage, and all restrictions upon the white suffrage of the various States would be removed. I say, for one, that that is an end which, instead of fearing, I would like to see accomplished by an amendment of this character.

Sir, upon this matter of restricted suffrage we have a history, and we know the history of other countries in relation to it. We know that wherever any State or country has at once gone to the bottom of the matter and adopted universal suffrage, a great many difficulties have been avoided that otherwise have clogged the legislation of countries where the principle of restricted suffrage has been in operation. The other day I had the curiosity, in the law library, to examine the origin of restricted suffrage by law; and I hold in my hand the volume in which is recorded the first law upon this subject. It was based upon a misrepresentation, as it always has been continued on misrepresentation; and with the permission of the House I will read what Hume calls the remarkable preamble of the law of Henry VI, which is the first law upon the statute-book providing for qualified suffrage. The law was passed in 1420, and provides "what sort of men shall be choosers, and who shall be chosen Knights of the Parliament." The preamble says:

"Whereas the elections of knights of shires chosen to come to the parliaments of our lord the King, in many counties of England, have now of late been made by very great [outrageous] and excessive number of people dwelling within the same counties, [of the realm of England,] of the which most part was by people of small substance, or of no value, whereof every of them pretended to have a voice equivalent, as to making such elections, with the most worthy knights and esquires dwelling within the same counties, whereby"—

Now mark the language used here:

"whereby manslaughter, riots, batteries, and divisions among the gentlemen, and other people of the same counties, shall very likely arise and be, unless convenient and due remedy be provided in this behalf."

Upon this question of restricted suffrage, the Parliament of Great Britain has been exercised from that day to this with agitations arising from the effort to get rid of the restrictions which were initiated by that statute of Henry VI—an agitation that is to-day still going on, and which, I hope, will not cease until suffrage shall be as free in England as it is in the State of Maine.

Sir, the history of elections falsifies the very remarkable preamble to the statute to which I have referred, for in England everywhere, at the hustings and at the polls, during election contests, candidates are treated with more violence than they are in any section of this country, not even excepting the city of New York. The most amusing descriptions of the scenes which occur are given by our writers. I received the other day a letter from an acute observer, who described how he saw the distinguished Mr. Mill treated on the hustings during the recent election contest; how he stood there saving the air and gesticulating before a mob of people who, in their confusion and disorder, could not hear a word that he said; and how other gentlemen were driven from the stand with black eyes and bloody noses and torn clothes. It is quite certain that the disorders the statute of Henry was nominally designed to avoid are by no means out of date.

The whole history of restricted suffrage shows that it is better for the electors and better for those who are chosen that all persons of due age, who are citizens of the country, shall be allowed their voice, however humble or however potential it may be, in saying who shall make their laws.

For these reasons, thus briefly expressed, I shall vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, when the amendment under consideration was first introduced to the House, I avowed, in the course of a colloquy with the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] my irrevocable hostility to it, because I discovered in it the consequences which have been so glowingly depicted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.] I had the honor yesterday to submit a substitute embracing a proviso guarding against the conclusion which I, in common with those gentlemen, apprehend might be warranted by the original amendment, and I wish to say that, if it should be determined, by a majority of those gentlemen with whom I have labored here for the last four years to maintain our Union, that the amendment should be passed with that proviso, it shall not fail for the want of my vote.

In the course of my remarks on the 10th instant, I took occasion to point out a slight error in constitutional law into which the President seemed to have fallen. I did it as kindly and respectfully as I could, saying that the great and pressing duties in which he had been engaged as military governor of Tennessee, and in the high office to which he had been so suddenly and unexpectedly called, had prevented him from studying the question historically. But my distinguished friend from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who, I am sorry to see, is not now in his seat, seemed to think that I had spoken "somewhat patronizingly" of the President. Sir, I am incapable of assuming to "patronize" so distinguished a functionary as the President of the United States. I am as incapable of that as I am of flattering the official fountain of honor and political cornucopia of our country. It is not often said of me that I—

"Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,
Where thrift may follow fawning."

And I entertain too much respect for any man who may have been called to fill so distinguished a place as that of the Presidency of the United States to attempt to patronize him.

The gentleman from Iowa took exception to my apprehension of the very explicit remarks of Mr. Madison in the Virginia convention that ratified the Constitution of the United States. He said that the clause to which those remarks referred did not and was not intended to give Congress the right to regulate suffrage in the States, even as to the election of members of Congress and President. This was the gentleman's language:

"It is evident that by the word 'manner' is meant something else; perhaps whether by ballot or visa voce, by general ticket or by separate districts, and all other things that come properly under the term 'manner.' But it evidently was never intended by Mr. Madison, or by the framers of the Constitution, or by the people when they adopted it, that the Legislatures and conventions of the several States might be deprived of the power to say who would be the qualified electors of the State Legislatures, and indirectly, the qualified electors of members of Congress."

Having interrupted him to invite his more particular attention to the language of Mr. Madison, I promised the gentleman that I would produce further authority on the point, which I did not happen to have by me at the time; and I trespass now for a brief moment upon the attention of the House that I may make good that promise, and show that James Madison himself, on the 9th of August, 1787, on the floor of the Convention that framed the Constitution of the United States, carefully and elaborately excluded the conclusion announced by the gentleman from Iowa, and vindicated the doctrine which I presented to the House and maintain.

The extract which I propose to read is from Mr. Madison's report of the doings of that Convention, and is found in the third volume of the Madison Papers, published by authority of Congress in 1840. This volume, gentlemen will remember, contains Mr. Madison's minutes of the debates and action of the Convention.

But before proceeding to read it, let me remark that what is now article four of the Constitution was article six in the draft of the Constitution submitted to the Convention; and that that body had not adopted "Congress" as the title of the national Legislature, and therefore invariably spoke of it as the "national Legislature." These suggestions will probably make the matter I propose to submit to the House more clear.

It being, as I have said, on the 9th of August, I find on pages 1279 to 1282 as follows:

"Article vi, section one, was then taken up.

"Mr. MADISON and Mr. GOVERNOR MORRIS moved to strike out 'each House,' and to insert 'the House of Representatives;' the right of the Legislature to regulate the times and places, &c., in the election of Senators being involved in the right of appointing them; which was disagreed to.

"A division of the question being called for, it was taken on the first part down to 'but their provisions concerning,' &c.

"The first part was agreed to, nem. con.

"Mr. PINCKNEY and Mr. RUTLEDGE moved to strike out the remaining part, namely, 'but their provisions concerning them may at any time be altered by the Legislature of the United States.' The States, they contended, could and must be relied on in such cases.

"Mr. GORHAM. It would be as improper to take this power from the national Legislature as to restrain the British Parliament from regulating the circumstances of elections, leaving this business to the counties themselves.

"Mr. MADISON. The necessity of a General Government supposes that the State Legislatures will sometimes fail or refuse to consult the common interest at the expense of their local convenience or prejudices. The policy of referring the appointment of the House of Representatives to the people, and not to the Legislatures of the States, supposes that the result will be somewhat influenced by the mode. This view of the question seems to decide that the Legislatures of the States ought not to have the uncontrolled right of regulating the times, places, and manner of holding elections. It was impossible to foresee all the abuses that might be made of the discretionary power. Whether the electors should vote by ballot or visa voce; should assemble at this place or that place; should be divided into districts or all meet at one place; should all vote for all the Representatives, or all in a district vote for a number allotted to the district; these and many other points would depend on the Legislatures and might materially affect the appointments. Whenever the State Legislatures had a favorite measure to carry, they would take care so to mold their regulations as to favor the candidates they wished to succeed. Besides, the inequality of the representation in the Legislatures of particular States would produce a like inequality in their representation in the national Legislature, as it was presumable that the counties having the power in the former case would secure it to themselves in the latter. What danger could there be in giving a controlling power to the national Legislature? Of whom was it to consist? First, of a Senate to be chosen by the State Legislatures. If the latter, therefore, could be trusted, their Representatives could not be dangerous. Secondly, of Representatives elected by the same people who elect the State Legislatures. Surely, then, if confidence is due to the latter, it must be due to the former. It seemed as improper in principle, though it might be less inconvenient in practice, to give to the State Legislatures this great authority over the election of the Representatives of the people in the general Legislature, as it would be to give to the latter a like power over the election of their representatives in the State Legislature.

"Mr. KING. If this power be not given to the national Legislature, their right of judging of the returns of their members may be frustrated. No probability has been suggested of its being abused by them. Although this scheme of erecting the General Government on the authority of the State Legislatures has been fatal to the Federal establishment, it would seem as if many gentlemen still foster the dangerous idea.

"Mr. GOVERNOR MORRIS observed that the States might make false returns, and then make no provisions for new elections.

"Mr. SHERMAN did not know but it might be best to retain the clause, though he had himself sufficient confidence in the State Legislatures.

"The motion of Mr. PINCKNEY and Mr. RUTLEDGE did not prevail.

"The word 'respectively' was inserted after the word 'State.'

"On the motion of Mr. REAP, the word 'their' was struck out, and 'regulations in such cases' inserted in place of 'provisions concerning them,' the clause then reading: 'but regulations in each of the foregoing cases may, at any time, be made or altered by the Legislature of the United States.' This was meant to give the national Legislature a power not only to alter the provisions of the States, but to make regulations in case the States should fail or refuse altogether.

"Article vi, section one, as thus amended, was agreed to, nem. con.

"Adjourned."

And so, Mr. Speaker, that great day's business closed, leaving to us in this hour of trial for our country a rule of action which, if adhered to, will settle all our difficulties and establish the fact that there is on earth a Republic founded upon the inalienable rights of man, in which the humblest man, when he recounts his political rights, sets forth all that the strongest, the wisest, and the proudest may claim. Social inequalities there will be, and natural inequalities are ordained of God; but when our fathers gave us the Constitution they meant that within the wide limits of our country the measure of one man's political rights should ascertain the extent of those of every other man dwelling beneath that dome which is the fit canopy for a continent, the Constitution of the United States.

A few words more and I shall have done. The power which the framers of the Constitution believed they had incorporated in it is essential not only to protect the negro but the white man. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] said that but one race had been enslaved. His hasty assertion has been well qualified by the eloquent gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE;] but I beg leave to add a word to what he has so well said. The assertion that white persons have been sold into slavery does not depend on common report, but is proven by the reports of the superior courts of almost every southern State. One poor German woman, who had arrived in our country at thirteen years of age, was released from slavery by the supreme court of Louisiana, but not until she had become the mother of three mulatto children, her owner having mated her with one of his darker slaves. Toward the close of the last century the supreme court of New Jersey decided that American Indians could be reduced to and legally held in slavery. And so long ago as 1741 white slave women were so common in North Carolina that the Legislature passed a law dooming to slavery the child of every "white servant woman" born of an Indian father.

Sir, under the infernal system of American slavery all races have been enslaved. I remember taking from this District what was known here as a negro boy, and who, though free, was the associate of slaves; but in my home, where he was known as the companion of my own child, nobody suspected a taint in his blood. I placed him among the children of the most respectable people in the country, in the celebrated institute of learning maintained near my residence by my friend, Rev. Professor E. D. Saunders, and though he was there the playmate of more than a hundred boys, none suspected a taint in his blood; and for nearly a year he attended one of our populous grammar schools, where he mingled with well nigh a thousand children; and when he returned to his worthy father's roof in this District, nobody but he and myself knew that he was returning to the degradation imposed by our laws on the American citizen of African descent in the capital of his country.

But still further. The enforcement of this long dormant power of the Constitution is needed by the wise, the strong, and the wealthy of our country, as well as by the poor, the ignorant, and the weak. There is now pending before the Legislature of regenerated, and as gentlemen would have us believe, reconstructed Virginia, a bill to require five year's residence on the part of citizens of other States who may invest their capital and settle within the sacred limits of the Old Dominion before they can acquire citizenship. If they may pass a limitation of five years, why may they not pass a limitation of fifty? Why will not any limitation that comes within the ordinary duration of human life be admissible?

Sir, if Congress cannot control the question of suffrage by exercising the power which Madison and his collaborators in the Federal and Virginia conventions believed they had vested in the Constitution, what restraint is there upon such legislation as this, and how can it enforce the first clause of section two of article four of that Constitution, which provides that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States?" Gentlemen tell me that this is a new construction of the Constitution, and I reply that it is the true one, which is enough for me, and that the old and false one was the fruitful source of discord and war and misery.

Sir, if we do not assert this power, which the men of Virginia, when they adopted the Constitution of the United States, knew to be in it, how can we restrain them from debarring northern emigrants from citizenship in their States? I proved the other day that the Convention of that State adopted the Constitution in the face of the fact that an exposition of the meaning of the word "manner," which embraced the idea upon which I now insist, had been given to it. And I have now given you the evidence that the whole country, so early as the 9th of August, 1787, two years before the final adoption of the Constitution, were informed that that word in the clause in question embraced not merely the method of voting, the place of voting, and the order of voting, but the grand fundamental question of who should vote, and by what power they might be invested with the right of suffrage.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will inquire, Mr. Speaker, if this question is now in a condition that any amendment or substitute can be offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that six amendments are pending now. The only one that could be offered would be to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] which was, to add the word "therein" in the fifteenth line. No other amendment would be in order now, the whole legislative power to amend being exhausted.

Mr. BROMWELL. That is what I apprehend. And it is difficult to see, among all the amendments which are now pending, any one of them, or any combination of them, that will meet the desire of the majority, not to say two thirds of this House. I apprehend that the members of this House desire to act so as to secure the support of a proper majority here. I apprehend also that they desire to make this amendment such that it will meet with the sanction of a sufficient number of the States of the Union to make it effectual. Now, sir, it is in vain for this Congress to launch an amendment which shall die on the road through the Legislatures. We hear objections urged here to the basis of representation upon actual voters. Is there not sufficient reason to believe that if this amendment were adopted it would perish for want of the sanction of three fourths of the Legislatures of the United States? How many States can we afford to lose? It is one thing for us to make an amendment that shall satisfy this body; it is another thing to make an amendment that shall be proclaimed as a part of the fundamental law of this land.

I have objections, fundamental objections, to the resolution reported by this committee. In the first place, the objection that has so often been noticed in this debate, that this provision is loose, is well taken. It allows its own object to be defeated by leaving the door wide open for any State to prescribe a property qualification, and thereby practically disfranchise the very class of persons that this amendment is designed to protect.

Why, it does more than this, sir. In my opinion, it offers a premium to the oligarchy of any State, to the oligarchical principle in any State, to surround itself with a disqualifying law, as by that means, if the disqualification be placed upon any other ground than color or race, such oligarchy can have Representatives in this Hall, and deny, as it inclines ever to deny, the elective franchise to the body of the people.

Sir, the instruction offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has this merit, that it does not leave that door open; but several of the other amendments offered here leave this door open. They would allow a State like North Carolina, by a law providing that for some frivolous office all may vote, to declare herself a State in which all are voters, and thereupon demand representation here. It is true, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio does say, "voters qualified to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature;" but that amendment, in my opinion, is nothing more than an amendment providing for a basis of representation according to actual voters. Now, the proper mode of arranging the basis of representation is according to the population of the class who do vote. For instance, if the black man is debarred from voting, make the basis of representation the white population, and not the white voters; and if black men and white men both vote, then make the basis of representation the white and black population; if the Indian vote, extend the basis accordingly.

An amendment which I did intend to propose would provide for these several difficulties. In the first place, it would obviate the objection which comes to us from the New England States against making mere votes the basis of representation. In the next place, it would provide against the difficulty which is let in upon us by this amendment to the Constitution offered by the committee; and lastly, it would provide against one difficulty which exists in every amendment heretofore offered, and that is this: there is not an amendment which has been proposed upon this floor but what leaves the door open for any State that chooses to disfranchise its black population and to admit its females to the right of suffrage; and they, being voters, are to be counted in fixing the basis of representation on this floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the gentleman misapprehends entirely the tendency of my amendment. The amendment which I proposed, and which I have since repeated in the form of a substitute for the instructions to be given to the committee, contains some three or four limitations upon the qualifications of voters. They are to be such persons as shall be made voters by the States, having the qualifications requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, as we have the clause now in the Constitution; but in addition to that they must be males, they must be citizens of the United States, and they must be over twenty-one years of age; and no one is included within the scope of that amendment who does not come within all of those descriptive words.

Mr. BROMWELL. In alluding to the gentleman from Ohio, I had reference to the gentleman [Mr. LAWRENCE] who introduced the instructions now pending to be given to the committee on reconstruction in case the joint resolution should be recommended to them. I spoke concerning his proposition, and it does not provide against the cases I have stated, as I understand it.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The proposition I submitted provides that males only shall vote. It does exclude women.

Mr. BROMWELL. Well then, sir, I apprehend that the sum and substance of the amendment proposed is to base representation upon the number of voters in the State; that is, upon the legally qualified male voters, and that amendment, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to accept. I doubt, however, our being able to carry it before the Legislatures. I think there are several things that we ought to consider here: first, we want an amendment that will satisfy this House; secondly, an amendment that will do justice; and thirdly, an amendment that will become effectual.

I will read the amendment that I intended to propose merely that the ideas embodied in it may be communicated to gentlemen who may desire hereafter to alter the phase which this matter has assumed. I should have proposed, and shall now propose at the first opportunity, this as the basis of representation:

Representation in the House of Representatives of the United States shall be apportioned among the different States in the same proportion to the whole number of inhabitants in each State respectively (excluding Indians not taxed) as the number of male citizens qualified by the laws of such States to vote for representatives in the most numerous branch of the Legislature thereof is to the whole number of such citizens in such States, the enumeration and apportionment thereof to be made in such manner as Congress shall by law direct.

I believe that I am safe in saying that a representation based upon that apportionment would be such that whether a State disfranchised its citizens by property qualification, or by race or color, its basis of representation in this House would diminish precisely in proportion to the votes cut off.

For instance, we will suppose that a State has seventy thousand inhabitants, of which ten thousand are male citizens over twenty-one years of age. Now, if that State should cut off three thousand of its male citizens by a property qualification, or by any other, it would reduce the basis of representation here from seventy thousand to forty-nine thousand, and so on with a greater or less reduction of the qualified voters.

If, on the other hand, a State is situated, as is claimed to be the case with some of the New England States, so that it has an excess of female population, or other non-voters, in that case, by cutting down this basis of representation, its representation here would be decreased in the same proportion as the number of its actual voters bears to the number of its actual population. I know it has been objected that this idea is the same as the one founded upon actual voters. But it is not so, because it is based on population first, and then as restrictions are made by the laws of the State it goes back continually upon population, and never upon actual voters.

Now, sir, I wish to say that I for one am for amending the Constitution in reference to representation in this Hall. I think seventy years is long enough for fifteen, twenty, or thirty Representatives to sit here, and make laws to apply to northern people, with no constituencies behind them. I think it has been seen long enough that a large number of persons called property, made property by the laws of the States, shall give to the oligarchs of those particular districts of country the right to outvote the independent men of the North, of the free States, where some approximation has been made to securing God-given rights to all inhabitants. I think that it is wrong that the further a State recedes from common right and common justice the more power the oligarchy which controls it shall grasp in their hands; and I desire that this amendment shall be made so that it shall bear down upon that abuse with the crushing power of three fourths of the Legislatures of the Union.

I am astonished to hear gentlemen, like some who addressed us the other day, express themselves so exceedingly anxious that the southern States shall have the benefit of these negroes in their representation here in Congress, and still are not willing that these negroes shall choose, or have a voice in choosing, their Representatives here. If the negroes are to be represented, then let them have a voice in choosing the men to represent them, as Democrats do, as Republicans do, and as all honest men ought to wish to do and see done by others. If they are to be represented here, let them have their Representatives by an active living voice, representing their interests. But if they are to have no political rights that a white man is bound to respect, then let their voices be silent here also.

Sir, what is the idea of representation? The idea is that the Representative represents certain men. All persons entitled to a voice in the Government are not here, because they are too numerous; therefore certain of their number are sent. Their Representative here casts the vote of those who send him here. But how can he be said to cast a vote for men who are not endowed with the legal capacity to vote whether he shall come here for them or not? It is absurd, it is unjust; it is a part of that system of transforming and perverting the principles of right and justice in order to carry out the ends of oppression, which at all times has been but too successful in this country.

I hope, if this joint resolution is not referred to the Committee of the Whole, that it will be recommitted to the joint committee on reconstruction, so that it may come back to us in a shape to obviate alike the objections from the New England States, made against basing suffrage upon voters alone, and also the possibility of any State cutting off its black population by oppression and oppressive laws, and still obtaining credit for that population here; and also further prevent any State from disfranchising its citizens by reason of their ignorance, at the same time getting the benefit of their enumeration, while another State disfranchising some of its population for their color loses the benefit of that portion of its population.

Mr. ROSS. I want to inquire of my colleague [Mr. BROMWELL] why ladies more than negroes should be counted in the basis of representation without being allowed to vote?

Mr. BROMWELL. I suppose any gentleman can see that without much trouble. Ladies are a part of the family with most of us. The head of the family does the voting for the family. But inasmuch as the negro is not even of the white family is of a different race and so treated, as you refuse him the benefit of the principle which you accord to the family, you have no right to strip him of every attribute of manhood, and then ask the country to give you the benefit of his presence in your State when you come to make out your basis of representation. You do not associate with him; you do not affiliate with him; you do not go with him in counsel; you do not sympathize with him, and why should he be a part of your basis of representation? None of these causes operate in regard to the family, or any part of the white population.

Gentlemen say they oppose this amendment on principle, and not in detail. Why is it opposed here? Who is benefited by their opposition to it? Is it not the very States who by having too much and an undue influence in this very Hall precipitated the terrible convulsion of civil war upon this country? They get the benefit of every argument made here against the power and the right of the Government to pass this amendment to the Constitution.

Now, the objection which I have to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio who last offered an amendment, is that I fear it will meet in the Legislatures of the particular States an amount of opposition which it will not meet here. It is one thing for this whole Congress, assembled from many States, numbering many that may be indifferent on that question, to pass the joint resolution for an amendment of the Constitution; but it is quite another thing when the resolution comes to be subjected to the test of discussion in the Legislature of a State that has a particular interest to serve. Such States invariably protect their own interests and vote for that which gives them strength in the national councils. That is all the objection I have to it.

Mr. Speaker, when I arose I intended merely to state my objections to the several amendments which have been offered. I do hope, however, that this House will not, by a hasty and improper course, push any amendment through until it has been fully deliberated upon. When this amendment was introduced, on last Monday morning, the differences of opinion which have been developed in reference to the principles of the amendment were not anticipated. But to-day we see that it has, so far, not an advocate upon this floor. Such may be the result with every amendment which may be presented. My opinion is, that in matters of this kind, where this Congress sits, for all practical purposes, as a convention revising the Constitution, it is better to approach the determination of particulars by first agreeing on the general principles to be embodied in the whole. I would to-day prefer that the committee on reconstruction should be required to report the whole body of amendments which are deemed necessary by any considerable number of members of this House, that they might all come up together and be discussed; for they would in that way consume no more time than a single amendment will take in the manner in which the discussion is being conducted.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield the floor to my colleague [Mr. Cook] for twenty minutes.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, from a carefully prepared statement which I hold in my hand it appears that under the census of 1860 there would be in this House nineteen members elected upon the basis of representation which includes three fifths of the former slaves of the South.

These men have no constituencies; a representative is one who represents another, is the exponent of his views and the executor of his will. The men having seats in this House upon a slave basis merely were not chosen by and did not indicate the will of those who have the constitutional designation of three fifths of all other persons. So far as being heard in this House, or their wishes expressed, they might as well have been in Africa as America.

The practical fact with which we have to deal is this: the white people in certain States were granted an unequal and disproportionate number of Representatives upon this floor because they were the owners of slaves, so that in those States each voter had a greater power and influence in the Government than any voter in any free State; and to such extent was this inequality carried that in some districts in Mississippi one man was the equal, in power and influence in the election of members of this House and of the President and Vice President of the United States, of any two men in the district I represent. The men elected on this basis were the Representatives of the slave power which proved itself dangerous to the Republic while it lived, and is now dead. The foundation is gone, the superstructure should fall with it.

But by the fact that slavery is dead this inequality of representation is increased; instead of nineteen members, upon the basis of 1860, the number would be increased two fifths, the three fifths of a person has become a whole person. The reward of treason will be an increased representation in this House, an increased influence in the Government to the traitors who have sworn and striven to destroy it. It seems to me impossible that any candid man can seriously contend that loyal men who have loved their country and suffered for it should not have the same voice in the government of the country with the men who have fought to destroy it.

If gentlemen on the other side desire to make this issue to the country I hope that it will be promptly accepted by us. Let this issue be joined, and let us go to the country upon it. I can see and appreciate the reason why gentlemen on the other side of this Hall oppose this amendment. The men elected on this unequal basis are their allies, from whom they are now anxiously looking for reinforcements to enable them to regain the ascendancy in this House and in the national Government which they lost when those allies deserted them.

We have now, as I believe, the golden opportunity to remedy this evil which will never come again to the men of this generation. The system of slavery has fallen. The States whose representation was increased by it have, with two or three exceptions, destroyed their loyal and legal State governments, and now seek reconstruction. The committee on reconstruction having reported this amendment, I infer that they will, if this amendment is submitted to the State Legislatures by Congress, recommend that its adoption by the States lately in rebellion be one of the guarantees to be insisted upon as a condition precedent to their taking equal authority and rank in the Union with the loyal States.

Suppose we refuse to pass this proposition now. Is there any probability that it can be passed when the rebel States are again represented upon this floor with their unequal representation? And if it can, is it not certain that it will not be adopted by the States who are benefited by it, unless it is made a condition precedent to their reconstruction? The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] said that this question was pressed merely for the sake of agitation, (that argument has always been used to protect wrong and injustice,) and he said that it was only folly to believe it would be successful. I believe that it is folly to believe that it will ever be successful unless it is successful now. Some of the State Legislatures are now in session which will not again meet for two years. If we are going to pass this measure at all it must be passed now.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that, feeling the immense importance of this question, it is with great pain and with some impatience that I have listened to the efforts to defeat it on this side of the House, and I wish to consider briefly the objections urged to it.

1. It is insisted that the basis of representation should be voters only.

To this proposition there are these objections:

1. It is difficult to enumerate voters accurately; their qualifications are fixed by State laws. We cannot send Federal officers into every State to adjudicate, in disputed cases, the rights of those claiming to be voters under the State laws, as we should have to do.

2. It would not be just; the voters of the country are unequally distributed. The old States have fewer, the new States more, voters according to the white population. In other words, there is a greater proportion of women and children in the old States. These should be and are represented. They are represented, in the true sense of that word, by their fathers and brothers. The man who represents them does so really and practically, and not by legal fiction, like the man who represents "three fifths of all other persons."

3. It takes from the basis of representation all unnaturalized foreigners. I do not wish to discuss the question whether this would be judicious or not, but I do not want a measure of this almost supreme importance loaded down with these questions, and its passage jeopardized by the incorporation of provisions which would render it so liable to attack and misrepresentation.

There is this other objection: if ten thousand men in any State are disqualified by a State law from voting by a property qualification, we shall also deduct them from the basis of representation for want of a property qualification, a proposition odious to me, and which I believe cannot be successfully commended to the people. I think that the success of this proposition, in loyal States even, is wholly problematical, and we cannot afford to lose this opportunity to correct a great wrong simply by a difference about words.

It is said that Massachusetts prescribes as a qualification that voters should read and write, and that the unfortunate class who are disfranchised in that State should be looked after. Sir, has this exclusion ever worked harm to the Union? Does it make a real practical difference between the voter of Massachusetts and Illinois as to the influence each shall exercise in the Government of the country? Besides, I believe that practically it has no bearing even in Massachusetts. I am informed by men who have had great share in the politics of Massachusetts, that no man is practically disfranchised in Massachusetts because he cannot read and write, that it is never made a cause of challenge. However that may be, we are not now called to redress the wrongs of the non-voters of Massachusetts; their exclusion does not injure the nation practically, does not deprive a man in Illinois of his due share in the choice of President and Vice President, and his due influence in Congress. We cannot right all wrongs in a single measure; let us confine ourselves to those in which we have a practical interest.

It is said that the southern States may impose a property qualification, and so exclude the negroes, not on account of race or color, but for want of a property qualification, or that they might provide for a qualification of intelligence, and so disfranchise the negroes because they could not read or write, and still enumerate them. To do this they must first repeal all the laws now denying suffrage to negroes; and second, provide qualifications which will disfranchise half their white voters; two things neither of which will, in any human probability, occur. And in the event that it was possible that both these measures should be adopted, and all the blacks and half the whites disqualified, it would become a grave question whether the provision of the Constitution which requires the United States to guaranty to each State a republican form of government would not authorize the Government to rectify so gross a wrong. There is no measure to which fanciful objections may not be urged; but I believe this to be the least objectionable of any measure which has been suggested to meet this evil. But above all, I am well persuaded that it is the only measure that can meet the approval of three fourths of the States; consequently, that this is the only practical measure before the House.

To the propositions of the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN,] and of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] there is this unanswerable objection, they provide that taxation shall be based upon the valuation of property, each one hundred dollars' worth of property paying the same tax with every other one hundred dollars' worth of property. To this there are insuperable objections. Some species of property, like real estate in the State of Illinois, is not sufficiently productive to bear taxation, while some articles of luxury merely, as spirits and tobacco, must and can bear heavy imposts. Cotton, also, of which we have a monopoly, must be taxed, and England and France thus made to help bear the burden they have helped to impose. These projects are not now feasible.

Mr. ORTH. I move the gentleman's time be extended.

The SPEAKER. He is now speaking on the time of his colleague.

Mr. BROMWELL. I give one minute more.

Mr. COOK. This amendment has been presented by a very large committee of both Houses, composed of our ablest representative men. We have now the opportunity to pass this amendment which is the great question of the time; we may effectually subdue this rebellious power of slavery which has caused us so much suffering and evil. If by our want of ability to agree upon an amendment upon which we can unite and which will secure the support of the country, we shall suffer this golden hour to pass, then when we see these Halls filled with men elected from the States lately in rebellion upon this unequal basis defiant and dictatorial as of old, we shall look back with regret to this time, when both the power and the opportunity were given to us to right this great wrong, and we may well bethink us of some answer to be given to our people who have done and suffered so much to save this nation, why we did not when we had the power secure such an amendment to the Constitution as would assure every true and loyal man that he should count as much in the administration of the Government as any single traitor in the land.

Mr. BROMWELL resumed the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL. I ask my colleague to yield to me.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will yield to my colleague the remainder of my time.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire, as I have not had the floor before, to make a few remarks. I am not certain that I can present them all in the few minutes allotted to me, but I shall do so very briefly. The remarks that I shall make are suggested entirely by the debate that has taken place upon this floor to-day, as I had no previous purpose or expectation of speaking upon these questions.

I am surprised to hear my honorable colleague, [Mr. Cook,] for whom I have very great regard, avow himself in favor of the amendment proposed by the committee. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who reported this resolution, the leader of this House, and I might say, if it would not be deemed offensive, almost the master of the dominant party on this floor, has avowed to-day that he abhors the Constitution as it was made by our fathers and has ever done so, and this has but confirmed me in an opinion which I have long entertained, that the dominant party was organized upon principles of opposition to the Constitution as it was made by our fathers, and that when organized it was and now is a revolutionary party, and that it goaded us into civil war for the purpose of bringing on the revolution that they are now attempting to force upon the country.

Mr. STEVENS. Do I understand the gentleman as stating that I said I abhorred the Constitution?

Mr. MARSHALL. I understood the honorable gentleman to say that he abhorred the Constitution with the compromises as made in it by our fathers.

Mr. STEVENS. I said I abhorred that provision of the Constitution which recognized slavery.

Mr. MARSHALL. The compromises of the Constitution. I accept the explanation.

Mr. STEVENS. It is a thing I have said for forty years, and therefore I cannot forget it.

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, the gentleman has said it for forty years; he has been consistent in that; and those who are following his lead are actuated by the same principles, although they do not as honestly avow it. They were organized as a revolutionary party, with hatred to the Constitution as it was framed by our fathers, and they have goaded on this civil war for the purpose of bringing about a revolution in the Government and changing its organization.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MARSHALL. I have but two or three minutes.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Did the dominant party in this country, after the election of Mr. Lincoln, goad on the rebellion when they abused themselves and presented an amendment to the people of the United States guarantying to the slave oligarchy and southern traitors that there never should be an amendment to the Constitution without their consent? Was that goading them on to war?

Mr. MARSHALL. I say that the whole course of the dominant party after the election of Mr. Lincoln was such as to satisfy my mind that they desired civil war for the purpose of bringing about this revolution. But I did not rise for the purpose of speaking on that subject.

Sir, I am amazed to find any gentleman upon this floor advocating the proposition that has been reported by the committee. A more obnoxious one was never reported for the consideration of a deliberative body. The gentlemen who report it profess to be, and doubtless are, the peculiar advocates of the African race. I wish to ask them upon what principle of justice, upon what principle of free government, they have provided that if, after this amendment is adopted, South Carolina, Mississippi, or any other State shall adopt a provision that all white men over twenty-one years of age shall be voters, and all black men who have two hundred dollars' worth of property, and if there shall be ten thousand legal black voters in such State, upon what principle will you place in the Constitution of the United States a provision which would deprive these ten thousand legal black voters of any representation upon the floor of Congress, or of being considered in the basis of representation? And I wish to ask the honorable gentleman who reported this amendment if that is not the effect and result of the amendment reported from the committee. And my colleague [Mr. Cook] avows that he is in favor of such an amendment, although under the laws of South Carolina, Mississippi, or Kentucky, giving qualified suffrage to the negro, it would deprive all black voters of representation, of any voice upon this floor, or of being counted in the basis of representation. It cuts off from representation here the black men in New York who are allowed to vote by the constitution and laws of that State. How can men justify a proposition so monstrous, so enormous as this is, and at the same time profess to be the special advocates of progress and reform?

This merely satisfies me of what I have been satisfied before, that if any amendments are necessary to the Constitution of our country, this is not the time, and more especially is this not the place, to inaugurate such amendments.

I believe, notwithstanding the conceded wisdom, ability, and virtue of this House, that the fathers who framed our glorious Constitution were wiser, better, and nobler than we are; yet every day we have offered here some dozen or twenty proposed amendments to the Constitution, offered as if we were discussing resolutions in a town meeting. There seems to be no more regard here for the Constitution and its guarantees, as our fathers made it, than there would be for resolutions in a common caucus or in a town meeting. It is monstrous, it is absurd, and I hope the House will return to the ways of wisdom, and go to other and legitimate work of legislation, restore the Union, and bring relief and consolation to the hearts of thousands and millions of loyal people who are looking to this body to restore the Union of the States, a union of hands and a union of hearts, under the Constitution of our fathers.

Having shown, as I believe I have, that the proposition, as reported by the committee, is wholly untenable, it is monstrous, absurd, damnable in its provisions, a greater wrong and outrage on the black race than anything that has ever been advocated by others, I will, if I have time, refer to another point. The remarks I am now making are entirely extemporaneous. I understood the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to take the position, some days ago, that under the Constitution, as it now exists, Congress has the power to regulate suffrage in the States.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir; in accordance with the opinions of those who framed the Constitution, and those who were in the convention of Virginia, which ratified it.

Mr. MARSHALL. Where does the gentleman get that power? I know he refers to the section of the Constitution which says:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Now, that clause refers only to Senators and Representatives in Congress. Does the gentleman pretend that under this clause of the Constitution Congress has any power over the qualifications of electors for Governors or members of the State Legislature?

Mr. KELLEY. Not at all.

Mr. MARSHALL. It is admitted, then, that Congress has no power over the qualifications of those who shall vote for members of the Legislature and Governor. Now I wish to know from the gentleman, who admit that Congress has no power over the qualifications of electors for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Mr. KELLEY. I did not so understand the question of the gentleman. I understood him to refer to Senators and Governors.

Mr. MARSHALL. I said, "Governors or members of the State Legislature." Then I would call the attention of the gentleman to the following clause of the Constitution:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

That leaves this question entirely in the hands of the State, as has been explained by all the expounders of the Constitution. I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] read as authority some extracts from a debate in the convention of Virginia. But the doctrine stated in that debate did not touch the question of suffrage at all; it related merely to the mode and manner of holding elections. It was argued in that convention, and very properly, that if Congress had no control over the subject, the Legislatures of the States might decline or refuse to appoint a place for, or prescribe a mode of, holding elections for members of Congress. That discussion did not touch the question of suffrage; and the debate which the gentleman read here does not touch that question. The idea clearly expressed in that debate is that, if the State Legislatures do not provide the time and place of the election, and the mode of receiving the votes for members of this House, Congress shall then have the power to interpose and fix the "time, place, and manner" of holding the elections.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for one moment, I desire to say that if he had listened to my remarks he would have learned that Mr. Madison, in the Convention that framed the Constitution, asserted directly that the States might control those matters to which the gentleman has just alluded, but that the control of the suffrage was vested in Congress.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, it is utterly impossible, by any rules of construction that have ever properly been applied to language, to place any such construction as that upon the simple clause in the Constitution which has been read. I admit that, in the debates in the Virginia convention, at the time when the Constitution was under discussion in that body, Mr. Madison, in a running debate, is reported as having used certain language which is susceptible of the construction which the gentleman has placed upon it. But, sir, although such is the fact, yet the language of the Constitution itself, the uniform construction of this clause by those who took part in framing that instrument, the exposition of it by Alexander Hamilton in the Federalist, and by other distinguished authors, show conclusively that up to the time when the gentleman from Pennsylvania avowed his peculiar doctrine in the House the other day no man in the United States ever dreamed that any such power existed in Congress. It has been conceded, wherever the question has been raised, before the courts, in the Halls of Congress, and everywhere else, that the power to regulate the right of suffrage exists in the States, and in the States alone.

Mr. Hamilton, in the Federalist, No. 52, treating of this very question, uses the following language:

"The first view to be taken of this part of the Government [the House of Representatives] relates to the qualifications of the electors and the elected. Those of the former are to be the same with those of the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures. The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as a fundamental article of republican government. It was incumbent on the Convention, therefore, to define and establish this right in the Constitution. To have left it open for the occasional regulation of the Congress would have been improper for the reasons just mentioned. To have submitted it to the legislative discretion of the States would have been improper for the same reason; and for the additional reason that it would have rendered too dependent on the State governments that branch of the Federal Government which ought to be dependent on the people alone. To have reduced the different qualifications in the different States to one uniform rule would probably have been as dissatisfactory to some of the States as it would have been difficult to the Convention. The provision made by the Convention appears, therefore, to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established or which may be established by the State itself. It will be safe to the United States, because, being fixed by the State constitutions, it is not alterable by the State governments; and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitutions in such manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution."

I propose to read one other authority on this question, although I submit that, without any authority on the subject, no just rules of construction that have ever been applied to the exposition of language would sustain the interpretation which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has placed upon that clause of the Constitution. I will read the language of Mr. Curtis, who, in the second volume of his History of the Constitution, page 200, says, in speaking of this very clause of the Constitution:

"The committee of detail, after a review of all these considerations, presented a scheme that was well adapted to meet the difficulties of the case. They proposed that the same persons who, by the laws of the several States were admitted to vote for members of the most numerous branch of their own Legislatures, should have the right to vote for the Representatives of Congress. The adoption of this principle avoided the necessity of disfranchising any portion of the people of a State by a system of qualifications unknown to their laws. As the States were the best judges of the circumstances and temper of their own people, it was certainly best to conciliate them to the support of the new Constitution by this concession. It was possible, indeed, but not very probable, that they might admit foreigners to the right of voting without the previous qualification of citizenship. It was possible, too, that they might establish universal suffrage in its most unrestricted sense. But against all these evils, there existed one great security, namely, that the mischiefs of an absolutely free suffrage would be felt most severely by themselves in their own domestic concerns; and against the special danger to be apprehended from the indiscriminate admission of foreigners to the right of voting, another feature of the proposed plan gave the national legislature power to withhold from persons of foreign birth the privileges of general citizenship, although a State might confer upon them the power of voting without previous naturalization."

There is a standard work on the Constitution of the United States where the law is fully and plainly laid down as possible. And I would not have deemed it proper to make this exposition had not an intolerable construction been placed upon the Constitution, when there is nothing in that instrument, or in anything connected with the history of the provision referred to, which for a moment will bear such a construction.

I have already trespassed on the good nature of the House further than I designed. I only rose for the purpose of alluding to these two points. At some other time I may discuss all of these amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. SCHENCK obtained the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have the permission of my friend to ask unanimous consent to correct a joint resolution I submitted the other day, three lines having been omitted in printing it; and also that it be ordered to be printed as corrected.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SCHENCK then addressed the House. [His speech, as revised by himself, will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. HIGBY, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 25, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. FOOT. I rise to ask to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Pensions. I will state that it so happens that I have been placed upon four of the standing committees of the Senate, besides one special committee, and as I make it a matter of duty to attend all the meetings of all the committees upon which I have been placed, it occupies more of my time than I can well spare; and having intended, when some new members came into the body, to retire from one or more of those committees, I therefore now ask to be excused from further service on the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it the pleasure of the Senate to excuse the Senator from Vermont from further service upon the Committee on Pensions for the reasons stated?

The question being put, Mr. Foot was excused.

Mr. FOOT. I now move that the vacancy in the Committee on Pensions be filled by appointment by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, by unanimous consent.

Mr. GRIMES. I am in the same category with the Senator from Vermont, occupying a place upon four committees. I ask the Senate, therefore, to excuse me from further service upon the Committee on Public Lands.

The request was granted.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Chair be authorized to fill the vacancy.

The motion was agreed to, by unanimous consent.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of Alonzo Morse, praying for payment for certain United States notes lost by the burning of his dwelling on or about the 6th day of July last; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER. I have received a petition from John P. Brown, secretary and dragoman of our legation at Constantinople, in which he sets forth a series of services as chargé d'affaires at Constantinople, in the absence of the minister, for which he has never received any compensation, and he prays that compensation may be made to him on account of them. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations. And at the same time I move that the Senate order that the papers on file relating to the claim of John P. Brown for services as chargé d'affaires at Constantinople be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of members of the American church at Kingessing, Philadelphia; a petition of the Bellefonte Equal Rights League; a petition of the Morning Star Equal Rights League, Kingessing, and seven other petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for such an amendment of the Constitution of the United States as will prohibit legislation within any of the States or Territories against any portion of the inhabitants thereof on account of race or color, and that all such legislation now existing may be declared null and void; which were referred to the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the so-called confederate States.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Medina to the city of Leavenworth, and from Lawrence to Grasshopper Falls in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Paul S. Forbes, praying to be relieved from his contract with the Navy Department to build the sloop-of-war Idaho; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the petition and other papers of William Pierce, of San Francisco, California, praying for an issue to him of duplicate bonds in place of four Oregon war bonds lost by the burning of the steamer Golden Gate on the 27th of July, 1862, may be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims; and I present additional papers in relation to the claim, to take the same direction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of inhabitants of Indiana county, Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will forever prevent any State from making any distinction in civil rights and privileges among the naturalized citizens of the United States residing within its limits, or among persons born on its soil, on account of race, color, or descent; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition from citizens of western Pennsylvania, praying that the tax laws may be so amended as to exempt from their provisions all coal boats, coal flats, and coal barges which are used exclusively for carrying coals to market, and not used for any other purpose whatever; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the officers of the Kitting Bank, in Armstrong county, Pennsylvania, praying for either an amendment of the national bank law reducing the tax upon the circulation of that bank, or for special authority for its conversion to a national bank; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the revenue laws, both as applied to internal taxation and duties on foreign imports, be so adjusted as to secure the amplest protection to the labor and industry of the country in all their branches; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. M. J. Dixon, of the city of Alexandria, Virginia, in which she alleges that her property was sold at a tax sale by the officers of the United States, which sale she thinks should be set aside, and she prays Congress to take such action as may conduce to that end; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRESWELL presented the petition of J. J. Young, a captain on the reserved list United States Navy, praying to be allowed his pay from August 12, 1854, the date of his commission, until March 10, 1865, the date of the actual issuance thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DIXON. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 71) relative to the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and I move that the letter of the Postmaster General relative to the bill and the reasons for it may be printed with the amended bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of a portion of military reserve on St. Clair river, in the State of Michigan, for railroad purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CLERKS IN THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DIXON. I am directed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 96) authorizing an increase of the clerical force in the Post Office Department, to report it back without amendment and with a recommendation that it pass, and also to ask that it may be acted upon at this time, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill on the day it is reported.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which authorizes the Postmaster General, to employ four clerks of class one, seven of class two, fourteen of class three, and four of class four, who are to be paid until the 30th of June, 1866, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know why the passage of this bill becomes necessary. I have seen no report from the committee on the subject, and have heard nothing said in its behalf.

Mr. DIXON. I ask that the letter from the Postmaster General, accompanying the bill, and stating the reasons for it, may be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, January 19, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for your approval, the draft of a bill authorizing an addition to the clerical force of this Department.

The great increase of clerical labor incident to the restoration of the postal service throughout the southern States, added to the largely increased postal business in the northern States, as shown by the recent annual report of the operations of this Department, has rendered the addition of clerical force called for by this bill necessary to the prompt and satisfactory transaction of the business of this Department.

The number and classification of the additional clerkships required have been carefully arranged by the heads of the respective bureaus, after consultation with each other, and with myself, and I am satisfied that a less number than those asked for in this bill would not be sufficient for the proper management of the business of the Department. As the services of these additional clerks are greatly needed at this time, I trust that the bill may be acted upon with as little delay as possible.

I shall be happy to make further explanations to your committee, if desired, either by letter or in person, as may be most agreeable.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. DENNISON,

Postmaster General.
Hon. J. DIXON, Chairman, Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, United States Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OREGON LAND DISTRICTS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 30) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon, to report it back and recommend its passage with one amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the present consideration of that bill. I think there can be no objection to its passage. It has been submitted to and approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. GRIMES. I have not heard what the bill is which we are asked to consider.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will state, in reply to the Senator from Iowa, that it is a bill to create an additional land office in the State of Oregon. Some of the settlers up the Columbia river have to travel now about three hundred miles to enter their lands. The Commissioner of the General Land Office tells me that there are important settlements in that locality, and that they ought to be provided with another office. It increases the public expenditures $1,000 and the expenses of the office, such as rent, fuel, and stationery.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no objection.

By unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 30) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to establish an additional land district in the State of Oregon and to fix its boundaries, which district shall be named after the place at which the office shall first be established; and the President is from time to time, as circumstances may require, to adjust the boundaries of the various land districts in that State, and to change the seat of the land office. A register and receiver are provided for, to reside at the site of the office, to receive the same fees and perform like services as other land officers in that State.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was, in line fourteen of section one, to strike out the word "seat" and insert "location," so as to make the clause read, "and to change the location of the land office from time to time."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 97) in addition to the several acts for establishing the temporary and permanent seat of Government of the United States, and resume the legislative powers delegated to the cities of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 98) to incorporate the Metropolitan Fire and Marine Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. NESMITH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 99) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Albany, Oregon, to the eastern boundary of said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 100) to establish a post road from Wallula, in Washington Territory, to Helena, in Montana Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON (while the committees were being called for reports) submitted a motion to take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 88) to restrict the expenses of collecting soldiers' claims against the Government.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the morning business is disposed of, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a bill in relation to the qualification of jurors in certain cases in the courts of the United States, which was up for discussion a few days since, and was postponed until this morning by a vote. I ask that that bill be now called up, and that if there be not time to dispose of it this morning, it be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is perhaps by courtesy entitled to the floor on the motion made by him to take up a bill, which motion he waived at the time, at the suggestion of the Chair, to allow the morning business to be gone through with.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the bill to which I have called attention was on motion set down for to-day. I understand, however, that the Freedmen's Bureau bill is still pending before the Senate, and is expected to be disposed of to-day. I ask the Senate, therefore, to take up this bill now and set it for to-morrow, so that it shall not stand in the way of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is expected that the Freedmen's Bureau bill will be disposed of to-day; but there is another bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary which has some connection with the Freedmen's Bureau bill; many of its provisions are of the same character and intended to be general in their operation; and it is my intention, if I can get the consent of the Senate, to press that bill upon the consideration of the body as soon as we shall have disposed of the Freedmen's Bureau bill. I think it will take less time then. Many of the questions which have been already discussed upon the Freedmen's Bureau bill are the same as will arise in the consideration of the other bill, and I trust the Senate will allow the other bill to come up and be disposed of immediately after the Freedmen's Bureau bill shall have been gotten out of the way. I shall therefore object to setting this particular bill or any other bill for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. I object to setting this bill for any particular day, because I desire to secure action on the bill for the admission of Colorado. I gave notice that I should call it up yesterday; but I had no opportunity to do so, and I propose to wait until the two very important bills referred to by the Senator from Illinois shall have been disposed of. I desire that the bill for the admission of Colorado shall follow them next in order of time. I am opposed to allowing the bill named to come in between them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not expect that there would be time this morning to dispose of the bill to which I have referred, and I do not wish to have the residue of the morning hour taken up in talking about it; and therefore, expressing my hope that it will be taken up at an early day, I withdraw the motion.

NORTHERN KANSAS RAILROAD.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of granting ten sections of land to the State of Kansas, to aid the Northern Kansas Railroad Company in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Elwood, the western terminus of the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad, through the northern counties of the State of Kansas, via Marysville, to intersect the Kansas branch of the Pacific railroad, to report by bill or otherwise.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of a portion of military reserve on St. Clair river, in the State of Michigan, for railroad purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

COLLECTION OF SOLDIERS' CLAIMS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 88, to restrict the expenses of collecting soldiers' claims against the Government.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 88) to restrict the expenses of collecting soldiers' claims against the Government was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that the fees of agents and attorneys for making out and causing to be executed the papers necessary to establish any claim of any commissioned officer or enlisted man of the regular Army, volunteers, or militia forces when called into the service of the United States, and for collecting such claim for bounty, arrears of pay, or other allowances, shall in no case exceed ten dollars; but the expenses incurred in acknowledging the necessary affidavits in such claims before a notary public, justice of the peace, or other public officer, are to be defrayed by the claimant, but in no case to exceed the actual amount established by law for such acknowledgments.

Any agent or attorney who shall directly or indirectly demand or receive any greater compensation for his services in the collection of any claim for bounty, arrears of pay, or other allowances, or who shall contract, agree to prosecute, or collect any such claim, on the condition that he shall receive a per cent. upon any portion of it, or who shall wrongfully withhold the payment of the proceeds to the claimant, is to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction to be fined not exceeding $300, or imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia was in section one, line five, after the word "any" to strike out "commissioned officer or," and after the word "man" to insert "or heirs of any enlisted man," so as to read:

That the fees of agents and attorneys for making out and causing to be executed the papers necessary to establish any claim of any enlisted man of the regular Army, volunteers, or militia forces, &c.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that the committee struck out commissioned officers for the reason that it was supposed the commissioned officers could protect themselves and make their own bargains, and would be less liable to be imposed upon than soldiers. In the next place, many of the commissioned officers have accounts open with the quartermaster's department and the ordnance department; and the amount of labor necessary to collect those accounts is very much larger for officers than for soldiers. The claims of the latter are generally very simple matters.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I believe this bill comes from the Committee on Military Affairs. I have all due respect for their judgment, but it is obnoxious to so many objections of a legal character that I really think it ought to be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary. What earthly power. I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts, has the Congress of the United States to regulate the compensation which a private citizen of the United States, in any of the States or Territories of the Union, may choose to make to any other private citizen for services rendered? Just as much authority has the Congress of the United States to prescribe by law that no man shall hire a soldier at a less price than so many cents or so many dollars a day, as it has to pass this act. If the Congress of the United States has a right to say that none of the soldiers who have served in the Army of the United States shall give to any attorney more than ten dollars, it has a right to say they shall not give less to any attorney than ten dollars; and if you have a right to say those things, you have a right to say that no person shall employ, to work on his farm, any one who served in the Army of the United States for a sum less than one dollar nor more than one dollar. Has it come to this, that the powers of this Government have become so enlarged that it can enter into all the private transactions of life, regulate the compensation between clients and attorneys throughout the United States, regulate the prices of wages throughout the United States? If it can do the one, it can do the other. Most of these soldiers are no longer in the armies of the United States; they have been disbanded, and have returned to their homes, and are following the peaceful avocations of life.

It goes further. It extends to any contract made between the heirs of any of those soldiers and attorneys. I have no earthly interest, personally or professionally, in the matter; but, as an attorney, if I was to draw the papers in any such case, certainly I should not expect to be regulated by any act of Congress.

I raise this objection to the bill because, in my judgment, it is wholly without any warrant of authority, and I therefore move either that it be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, or that it be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from Delaware that we provide by law what the fee shall be for collecting pensions, and that act was passed three or four years ago. We allow ten dollars to any person who collects a pension for a soldier or his heirs. This act puts claims for bounty and back pay on the same footing as claims for pensions in that respect. I do not think there is any doubt whatever that we had the power to pass the act in regard to pensions. We also passed an act, it will be remembered, fixing the fee for surgeons' certificates, and I do not think anybody doubts that we had that power. I do not doubt that we have this power, and further than all, that we have power to prevent any private person doing this business, and to appoint agents of the Government, if we please, for the purpose; and I am not sure that that is not the only proper way. If the Government should appoint in every State an agent to do this business, and fix the fees for doing it, and put the person under bonds to have it faithfully done, it might be the best way of doing the thing.

Mr. President, nobody can measure the wrongs and outrages that have been perpetrated upon the soldiers of this country by these agents. I have received this morning, in my morning mail, two letters. One of our officers, a revenue collector in the State of New York, writes me that in his own town, to his own personal knowledge, an agent charged a poor soldier $150 for collecting $300. A gentleman writes me from Brooklyn, New York, in regard to a case that happened in December, since Congress met, that one of these agents charged $51 62 for collecting a claim for the mother of a dead soldier; and he says further, and gives the names, that certain agents within his knowledge have their agents here, and he gives me the name of a person employed by the Government here who is an agent for one of those persons to find out the value of the claims. I intend to have his name put in the hands of the proper officer to-day.

I hope that we shall put agents for collecting the claims and bounties of soldiers on the same footing that we put the agents for collecting pensions. I think it right. It is a protection to the people, and we certainly ought to protect them. If such a measure had been passed years ago, it would have protected soldiers and their heirs, probably to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that while his bill may do some good, perhaps much good, there is danger that it may do much mischief and will leave untouched a very large class of cases which in my judgment it is very difficult to reach, and which, perhaps, cannot be provided for. I understand that there is quite as much and perhaps more difficulty in getting out of the hands of some agents, when they collect the money, any portion of it, as there is in regard to the fees charged. I have been told that in this District there have been various firms who would advertise as claim agents in the shape of one firm, and would collect claims, and then change their firms, and in many instances, where the soldier applied to know if they had got his claim, they would say to him, "No, we have not collected your claim," and on inquiry at the War Department or the proper Department it would be found that it had been collected; and then, when the soldier or officer went and said to these agents, "Pay me that money or I will commence a suit," they have replied, "Sue; what good will it do? What will you get by a suit?" This bill will not reach a case of that kind. It might reach some cases, but the objection is that while it would reach a certain class of cases, it would do much injury to many men who are very earnestly and honorably and creditably to themselves and their constituents pursuing this business of recovering claims for the soldiers. It would in my judgment have precisely this effect: that the attorney would first ask a man who came to employ him to collect a claim, "How much difficulty will there be in getting your claim?" And if he should reply, "No difficulty at all; you have only to apply for it and you will get it," then he would undertake to collect it. But in the vast majority of cases there is a great deal more difficulty and more labor to be performed. Perhaps the attorney has got to travel twenty, fifty, or a hundred miles to obtain proof and collect testimony and transmit it to Washington and then collect the claim. Will he do that for ten dollars? Certainly he cannot; and while you are preventing mischief in one direction, I suggest that possibly you may be creating a difficulty in another direction. It is very true that we have done something in this direction in regard to pensions; but it may be that we shall do more mischief here than we shall do good.

I agree that something ought to be done. I have had my feelings very much touched when some of these soldiers have come to me and complained of the difficulty of collecting their claims; soldiers who had had the whole of their claims swallowed up in this way. There would be a remedy in the case which the Senator from Massachusetts has stated, where one of these agents charged a New York soldier $150 for collecting a claim of $300. If he took an exorbitant fee in that way, the man who has been injured may bring an action against the claim agent, if he is worth anything, and recover all but what was a proper fee; but the difficulty is that probably he is not worth a copper.

Mr. HARRIS. None of them are.

Mr. CLARK. None of them are worth a copper, says the Senator from New York. This bill will not reach them at all. There is a mischief that we cannot reach or cure, to say nothing about the objection made by the Senator from Delaware. I do not propose to touch upon that objection; but on the expediency of the thing, I think you must have something a little more efficient than I fear this bill will be; I do not know what it should be.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I will ask the Senator if he has ever learned that any difficulty has arisen on account of our fixing the fees of the pension agents? We fixed the fees of pension agents, as you, sir, will remember, for I believe you reported the bill, in 1861. There will be found to be quite as much labor, and I think a great deal more, in preparing the papers to obtain a pension than to obtain back pay or bounty, and yet we fixed that fee at ten dollars, and I have never heard that there was any trouble about it. We have no complaints from any quarter about the obtaining of pensions, but there are complaints all over the country in regard to the collection of back pay and bounties by these agents.

In this connection, let me state one fact. Some three weeks ago, I received a letter from a woman in the city of New York, stating that she had confided to a concern in this city her claim to be collected. She had reason to think it had been paid. I sent the paper to the Auditor's Office, and found the money had been paid, and after a correspondence between the Department, myself, and this woman, running through three or four weeks, I found the fact to be that this agent had obtained a woman to swear that she was the proper person, and had pocketed the money himself.

Mr. SUMNER. What is the name of the agent?

Mr. WILSON. He was a partner of the person of whom I have already spoken, but I do not know that that person was at all to blame for it.

Mr. CLARK. This bill would not reach that case.

Mr. WILSON. It punishes by fine and imprisonment, as they ought to be, all these agents who will not pay over the money when they collect it. This man finally, as I understand from Mr. French, the Second Auditor, undertook to erase these forgeries afterward, and by this correspondence this poor woman in the city of New York got her money, and this partnership was dissolved. The man who did that was evidently a great scoundrel; and I tell you that shysters and dishonest men have gone into this business to a large extent.

I desire to state another fact. A gentleman in the city of New York, a son of Mr. Dodge who is contesting a seat in the other House, who has given his time for the last four or five years to the cause of the soldiers, who has made an organization in the city of New York by which he and his associates have obtained employment for eighteen hundred wounded men without one dollar of cost to them, who has undertaken to collect these claims without charging a dollar for the collection, says he finds great difficulty in getting his papers through, while the persons that throng in the country and have their agents here find no difficulty in getting their claims through. They are on the spot; they are watching; they are crowding their matters all the time; and this association organized in the city of New York, working for nothing, doing it as an act of charity and benevolence to the soldiers, composed of men of wealth and character, find the greatest difficulty in getting their papers through here. I believe that this bill, if passed, will drive the dishonest men out of this business and will keep it in the hands of good men, for there are good men engaged in it. It will put them on the same footing as pension agents; it gives them the same compensation and makes them liable to the same punishments; in fact, the bill is substantially copied from the bill in regard to pension agents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 60.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, "Shall the bill pass?" and upon that question the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in the course of my time I have heard a good deal about the dignity of Senators. I never made any pretension of that sort myself; but I do claim that I have reached the dignity of true manhood, and that dignity impels me whenever a blow is aimed at the Constitution of my country and the liberties of the people, or my State, or myself, always to repel it with another blow, and when the aggressive blow comes from any citizen of my own State, I do not care whether his position be private or official, I am impelled to hit him with all the vigor I can throw in the repelling blow.

I stated last night when the Senate adjourned the points of opposition upon which I objected to the passage of this measure. As they are short, I will state them again.

First. I object to the passage of this bill, because a majority of the Senate exclude Senators from eleven States from their seats for the purpose of securing the passage of this and other measures.

Second. The measure is unconstitutional, because it proposes to invest the Freedmen's Bureau with judicial powers; because it authorizes the President to assign Army officers to the exercise of those judicial powers; because it breaks down the partition of the powers of the Government made by the Constitution, and blends and concentrates in the same hands executive and judicial powers; and because it deprives the citizen of his right to trial by jury in civil cases.

Third. It ought not to pass, because it is a scheme devised to practice injustice and oppression upon the white people of the late slaveholding States for the benefit of the free negroes, to engender strife and conflict between the two races, and to prostitute the powers of the Government for the impoverishment and degradation of the white race, and the enrichment and exaltation of the negro race.

Fourth. It will produce a profligate, wasteful, and unnecessary expenditure of the public money.

Fifth. It is one of the bold, reckless, and unconstitutional system of measures devised by the radical party to enable it to hold on to power and office.

If these objections are well stated, they are certainly sufficient to defeat this or any measure to which they can be made. I pledged myself yesterday and heretofore in relation to this measure that I would prove its unconstitutionality, and I think I am now ready to redeem that pledge. But in relation to the first ground of objection—that it ought not to pass because the majority of the Senate have resorted to a revolutionary measure and have dissolved the Union to secure its passage—can any proposition be more true or self-evident than that, when a majority of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of passing any measure, deliberately, wantonly, and in defiance of the Constitution and of the rights of the States to be represented in the two Houses of Congress, exclude from that representation in the two Houses eleven States, they have exercised and cut off those eleven States from the Union? Have they not dissolved the Union? If that does not amount to a dissolution of the Union, or a lawless, unconstitutional exercise of power by an oppressive, tyrannical majority, I do not know what can produce such a result? What right have the majority in this Senate to exclude the Senators from eleven States? They are entitled to representation here by the Constitution of our country. They are entitled to it by all the laws of justice and of sound policy. What extraordinary motive but the one which I have imputed to them can operate upon this majority to induce them to resort to this revolutionary measure, by which they have dissolved the Union and cut off eleven States from it, and from participation in its government? Is this to be a new principle of party tactics? When a majority in Congress desire to pass revolutionary measures upon which hang the permanence of the party and their hold of power and of the possession of the Government, are they to resort to the extraordinary and revolutionary measure of excluding from the Senate and the House of Representatives, Senators and Representatives of eleven States who are as much entitled to seats in the two bodies as they are, in order that they may be able to pass their unconstitutional measures?

My honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] said the other day that there were some eighty propositions to amend the Constitution pending before this Congress, and the cry is, still they come. Look at this measure; look at the measure that is immediately to follow it, which the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary says, eo instanti, when this bill is disposed of, he intends to press upon the attention of the Senate for its adoption; look at the bill to confer upon the negroes of this District the right of suffrage. I say that the object and sole purpose of this revolutionary movement of keeping out the Representatives of eleven States from the House of Representatives, and twenty-two Senators representing eleven States out of the Senate, is simply to enable the party in power to pass these measures. Are not these eleven States severed from the Government and the Union? What is the severance of the Union but the severance of the States from participation in the Government? That is the very essential definition of a severance of the Union. Are not these States, which are thus severed from the Union by the lawless will of the dominating majority here, as much interested, and tenfold more interested, in the measures to which I have adverted, and the pending one than the States who are permitted to retain their places in the Union, and who by the Representatives and Senators presume thus to revolutionize the Government and to cut them off from its benefits? In the name of the Constitution, which has been violated by the lawless and inexcusable and unauthorized dismemberment of the Union that has been made in the way that I have mentioned, in behalf of the deep, vital, permanent interest which the people of those eleven States have in these measures, I protest against the passage of this bill, or its consideration, until those States are allowed to come into the Union and to have their representatives in the Senate of the United States.

Sir, by what authority is this revolution effected by the majority? What a fearful precedent it will establish! If it is to prevail, as prevail I suppose it will, how alluring to future parties to tread the same bold and revolutionary path. They will exclaim to the party now in power, "Thou didst marshal me in the way I am going;" and the time will come when this bitter chalice with all of its poisonous ingredients will be tendered to your own lips. When that day comes, if I should live and be in public or private life, and this poisonous chalice is offered to you, I will dash it from your lips if I can, with the same will and readiness that I would now dash it from the lips of the southern States—not for your sake, but for the sake of my country, the Constitution, and the liberties of the people. For myself, for my posterity, for the posterity of the American people, I protest against the passage of this measure until the Union is restored. You have dissolved the Union. It is an act of your own will. You may restore the Union and repair the infliction which you have made upon it any moment you please. I ask you if those States are not entitled to representation in the Senate, and if they were here would you dare to press this infamous and iniquitous measure? If you did, with the concentrated power of those eleven States it would be defeated, and all your party advantages and all your perpetuity in office and power would be stricken to the ground.

I have said that this measure ought not to pass because it was unconstitutional, because it invests the Freedmen's Bureau with judicial powers. I understood my friend from Illinois at first to assume the position that it did not invest or propose to invest judicial powers in the bureau, but he afterward told me that I had misapprehended him, and conceded explicitly that it does invest judicial powers in this bureau. I say that that is a palpable and flagitious infraction of the Constitution. I will now read some of the provisions of this bill upon which I intend to comment:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, with the approval of the President, may divide each district into a number of sub-districts, not to exceed the number of counties or parishes in such district, and shall assign to each sub-district at least one agent, either a citizen, officer of the Army, or enlisted man.

And the President of the United States, through the War Department and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employes, agents, and officers of this bureau.

I ask the especial attention of the Senate to the seventh and eighth sections:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion,—

I moved an amendment excepting from the operation of the bill, and from the tyranny of this bureau, the States where the courts were now open. and where justice could be administered in them according to the course of the civil law; but the dominating party in this Senate voted it down by a solid phalanx. I will comment upon that in a moment—and wherein, in consequence of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation, custom, or prejudice, any of the civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons, including the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and estate, are refused or denied to negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or any other persons, on account of race, color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or wherein they or any of them are subjected to any other or different punishment, pains, or penalties, for the commission of any act or offense, than are prescribed for white persons committing like acts or offenses, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, through the Commissioner, to extend military protection and jurisdiction over all cases affecting such persons so discriminated against.

Was there ever such a fearful, tremendous, and most unauthorized investiture of judicial powers in a mere executive bureau of the Government before? The next section is in these words:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any person who, under color of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation or custom, shall, in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, subject, or cause to be subjected, any negro, mulatto, freedman, refugee, or other person, on account of race or color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or for any other cause, to the deprivation of any civil right secured to white persons, or to any other or different punishment than white persons are subject to for the commission of like acts or offenses, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both; and it shall be the duty of the officers and agents of this bureau to take jurisdiction of—

Yes, sir, vesting in them, in express and explicit language, the judicial power in all the class of cases herein described—and hear and determine all offenses committed against the provisions of this section, and also of all cases affecting negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or other persons who are discriminated against in any of the particulars mentioned in the preceding section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the President of the United States, through the War Department, shall prescribe.

Through the head of that Department, the Haynan of our country, who will stay there until he rots off! But here is the end to which all this systematic tyranny is to be pressed: here are the results to the party and to the freed negro that are to be brought about by the punitive character of this measure, and by the punishment which it authorizes the Freedmen's Bureau and its agents to inflict upon all the authorities of State governments:

The jurisdiction conferred by this section on the officers and agents of this bureau to cease and determine whenever the discrimination on account of which it is conferred ceases, and in no event to be exercised in any State in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has not been interrupted by the rebellion, nor in any such State after said State shall have been fully restored in all its constitutional relations to the United States, and the courts of the State and of the United States within the same are not disturbed or stopped in the peaceable course of justice.

Here is the deceitful language of this provision. It gives to this bureau this irresponsible action, backed by the bayonets of the Army of the United States, in every State where the proceedings of the courts have been interrupted by the rebellion. They have been interrupted, I presume, in the State of my honorable friend from Delaware; at any rate, they have been interrupted in Kentucky. Our State was invaded, and three fourths of it at one time was occupied by the rebel armies. Our Governor and Legislature and all the officers of our government were driven from Frankfort, the seat of government, and compelled to take refuge in Louisville, under the protecting wing of General Buell's army. With a view to meet this case, I proposed that this measure should have no application to States where the courts were now open and where the laws could be executed by the civil courts as those laws have been enacted, and the domineering majority here, for its own bold and revolutionary purposes, to a man voted down that just proposition. Here is the State of Kentucky, in which there has been this interruption of the civil courts; and the Senator from Illinois well knows it. He does not propose that this bill shall operate in the States where that interruption has been made and where it continues. He will not allow that it shall be restricted to the States in which the interruption now exists. He will not allow, and his friends, the united majority here, will not allow that the operations of this bill shall be inhibited from the State of Kentucky where the courts are now open and the laws may be enforced according to the Constitution. The honorable Senator knew the full force of these words; he knew that the design of this bill, framed as it was by his great legal acumen and ability and his comprehensive sweep of mind, was to entrap Delaware and Kentucky.

Mr. President, I say that this is a flagrantly unconstitutional investment of power. The Senator from Illinois deliberately concedes that this bill invests the Freedmen's Bureau with judicial powers. He could not deny it, because that language is embraced in it plainly, explicitly, and unmistakably. Judicial power is invested in this bureau by this bill, and this bureau may be composed, to such an extent as the President shall choose, of Army officers, of officers not in the civil service, who, when so appointed, are to hold their places at his will, who are not a part of the judicial department of the Government, but an appendage to the executive department of the Government. This bill provides that such officers may be assigned to the performance of these judicial powers. If the Senate will excuse me, I will read from a book that has almost become obsolete, especially in the Senate of the United States—the Constitution of the United States:

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

"The judicial powers shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority," &c.

Here is the judicial power of our Government as it is organized in the Constitution. That judicial power is vested by the letter of this Constitution, and where is it vested? It is vested in the Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish. It is not vested by the Constitution in a military bureau; it is not vested in an executive bureau; it is not vested in the President of the United States, much less in any of his subordinate officers. This bill flagrantly, palpably, in direct and open conflict with the Constitution, proposes to divest the courts of the United States of a portion of the judicial power which, by the letter of the Constitution, is vested wholly in them, and to vest it in this negro bureau, and then provides that this negro bureau may be constituted and organized of military officers. In this connection, in relation to what is the judicial power, I will read an extract from the opinions of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Weston and others vs. The City Council of Charleston, to be found in 2 Peters, 463:

"In this case"—says the learned judge—I will not call him "learned." It is superfluous to attach any phrase to the name of Marshall for the purpose of exalting his eminent judicial learning. All that is necessary is to pronounce his name—

"In this case the city ordinance of Charleston is the exercise of an 'authority under the State of South Carolina,' 'the validity of which has been drawn in question on the ground of its being repugnant to the Constitution,' and 'the decision is in favor of its validity.' The question, therefore, which was decided by the constitutional court is the very question on which the revising power of this tribunal is to be exercised, and the only inquiry is, whether it has been decided in a case described in the section which authorizes the writ of error that has been awarded. Is a writ of prohibition a suit?"

I wanted so to amend this bill that the citizen, the State judge, the Federal judge of the United States, the marshal of the United States in the execution of the judgment of the Federal judge, the sergeant-at-arms of the court of appeals, or the sheriff of the circuit court in which there was interference by this Freedmen's Bureau to impede and obstruct and divide them in the exercise of their judicial functions, could apply for a writ of prohibition to the proper court, and to insert a declaration in the bill itself that that writ should be observed and respected and obeyed by the Freedmen's Bureau, and you deliberately voted down that proposition.

"The term is certainly a very comprehensive one, and is understood to apply to any proceeding in a court of justice by which an individual pursues that remedy in a court of justice which the law affords him."

That is a concise and clear definition of a suit, and a suit involves, necessarily, judicial power.

"The modes of proceeding may be various; but if a right is litigated between parties in a court of justice the proceeding by which the decision of the court is sought is a suit. The question between the parties is precisely the same as it would have been in a writ of replevin or in an action of trespass. The constitutionality of the ordinance is contested; the party aggrieved by it applies to a court; and at his suggestion a writ of prohibition, the appropriate remedy, is issued. The opposite party appeals, and in the highest court the judgment is reversed, and judgment given for the defendant. This judgment was, we think, rendered in a suit."

The Supreme Court, then, Chief Justice Marshall rendering the opinion, proceed to decide this suit and to reverse the judgment of the court in South Carolina. They decide that a prohibition is a suit; that any mode of proceeding, whatever may be the form, in which one party is pursuing a right under the law in a court of justice, is a suit. The suits under this Freedmen's Bureau bill will be thick as leaves in Vallambrosa. A writ of error or an appeal from the judgment of an inferior court of the United States to the Supreme Court is not allowed unless the matter in controversy is of the value of $2,000. But here you do not organize a court; you do not profess to organize a court; and if you did, your organization of a court would be laughed to scorn by any county-court lawyer in America. The idea of the Congress of the United States organizing a court of the Freedmen's Bureau and authorizing the President to assign Army officers as judges of the court! Do you call that a court? I offered an amendment providing that from that court, miserable, farcical, and grotesque as it would be, there should be allowed a writ of error or appeal from its decisions to the district or circuit court of the United States and then to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court and these inferior United States courts are branches of the Government of which you are a branch; they are the appropriate judicial tribunals; they are a part of the Constitution of our country in the organization of the judicial department, to exercise exclusively the very jurisdiction with which you have attempted to invest this freed negro bureau. I appealed to your justice, to your magnanimity, to your sense of right, in order to prevent the abuse of power so anomalous, so unconstitutional, vested in this bureau by your bill, to allow appeals or writs of error from the judgments—no, I will not so desecrate the term judgments—the behests, the decrees, or whatever you may call them, of this anomalous, unconstitutional, and most contemptible tribunal to the courts of the country; and in the solid, undivided strength of party you voted that proposition down.

This abominable measure is unconstitutional in another important feature. It violates article seven of the amendments of the Constitution, which is in these words:

"In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law."

Here, sir, is your warrant of authority, your power of attorney. All the little, brief, transitory power with which you are clothed, and which you are now exercising in a manner to shock the world, you hold from the Constitution of the United States, and that Constitution declares explicitly that:

"In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law."

In exposition of this provision of the Constitution I will read an extract from the opinion of Mr. Justice Story in the case of Parsons vs. Bedford et al., to be found in 3 Peters's Reports, page 433. Let us see what the right of the citizen to have all matters of controversy in which twenty dollars are involved tried by a jury means by the judicial interpretation of the Supreme Court, and that interpretation written by Justice Story, with the concurrence of the court. He was once great authority all over the United States, and he is yet in the West and in the great middle States; but he has lost his power and his weight as a great judicial light in Yankee land; and why? Because his opinions and the principles which they established are incompatible with the present political systems of Yankee land. Here is what Mr. Justice Story says:

"The trial by jury is justly dear to the American people. It has always been an object of deep interest and solicitude, and every encroachment upon it has been watched with great jealousy. The right to such a trial, it is believed, incorporated into and secured in every State constitution in the Union; and it is found in the constitution of Louisiana."

The case came up from Louisiana.

"One of the strongest objections originally taken against the Constitution of the United States was the want of an express provision securing the right of trial by jury in civil cases."

And that objection was so strong and deemed to be of such vital importance that it was at once obviated by the adoption of the seventh amendment to the Constitution, which I have read, which secures that right.

"As soon as the Constitution was adopted, this right was secured by the seventh amendment of the Constitution proposed by Congress; and which received an assent of the people so general, as to establish its importance as a fundamental guarantee of the rights and liberties of the people. This amendment declares, that 'in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact once tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.' At this time there were no States in the Union the basis of whose jurisprudence was not essentially that of the common law in its widest meaning; and probably no States were contemplated in which it would not exist. The phrase 'common law,' found in this clause, is used in contradistinction to equity and admiralty and maritime jurisprudence. The Constitution had declared, in the third article, 'that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority,' &c., and to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. It is well known that in civil causes in courts of equity and admiralty juries do not intervene, and that courts of equity use the trial by jury only in extraordinary cases to inform the conscience of the court."

"When, therefore, we find that the amendment requires that the right of trial by jury shall be preserved in suits at common law, the natural conclusion is that this distinction was present to the minds of the framers of the amendment. By common law they meant what the Constitution denominated in the third article 'law,' not merely suits which the common law recognized among its old and settled proceedings, but suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined; in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were recognized and equitable remedies administered; or where, as in the admiralty, a mixture of public law and of maritime law and equity was often found in the same suit. Probably there were few if any States in the Union in which some new legal remedies differing from the old common-law forms were introduced; but in which, however, the trial by jury intervened, and the general regulations in other respects were according to the course of the common law. Proceedings in cases of partition, and of foreign and domestic attachment, might be cited as examples variously adopted and modified. In a just sense, the amendment then may well be construed to embrace all suits which are not of equity and admiralty jurisdiction, whatever may be the peculiar form which they may assume to settle legal rights. And Congress seems to have acted with reference to this exposition in the judiciary act of 1789, chapter twenty, (which was contemporaneous with the proposal of this amendment;) for in the ninth section it is provided, that 'the trial of issues in fact in the district courts in all cases except civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, shall be by jury;' and in the twelfth section it is provided, that 'the trial of issues in fact in the circuit courts shall in all suits, except those of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, be by jury;' and, again, in the thirteenth section, it is provided that 'the trial of issues in fact in the Supreme Court in all actions at law against citizens of the United States shall be by jury.'

I have read the provision of the Constitution, which is as plain and as explicit and as clear as language can express it. I have read the exposition of that amendment guarantying to every citizen the right of trial by jury in all civil cases when the amount involved in contest is as much as twenty dollars, by the Supreme Court of the United States, the opinion rendered by Mr. Justice Story; and they decide in conformity to the plain and explicit provision of the Constitution and in conformity to the provision of the judiciary act of 1789, passed, as they say, simultaneously with the adoption of this amendment. They show that by common-law suits were meant all suits contradistinguished from equity and admiralty suits. All this mass of suits, it is provided by the Constitution, where the amount is above twenty dollars, shall be tried by a jury. They decided that the Congress of the United States in passing the judiciary act of 1789 expressly provided that in the district and circuit courts and in the Supreme Court itself, wherever there is a common-law issue of the amount exceeding twenty dollars, either party to that issue is entitled to his constitutional privilege to have it decided by a jury.

Now, I think, Mr. President, that I have well made out my position, and that the honorable Senator from Illinois, with all his legal ability, cannot shake it, that this bill invests or attempts to invest not in a court but in an executive department judicial powers; that it blends and confuses the departments of the Government by authorizing the President to make this bureau consist, if he pleases, of Army officers who hold their office and position by his will. The Constitution directs that all judicial power shall be vested in the Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish; and it is a flagrant assumption of power, a flagitious infraction of the Constitution, to attempt by this bill to invest this bureau with any judicial power. In addition to the violation of the express assignment of power by the Constitution to the courts of the country, it violates the seventh amendment, which guaranties to every American litigant who has a common-law suit, a right to a trial by jury when the amount involved in the contest is twenty dollars or upward.

Let us now examine for a short time what is the object of passing this enormous, outrageous, and monstrous measure. Let me give you an example or two. Here are provisions that would deform any court in the world in any civilized country. The courts of Russia, all the grand courts of the Ottoman Porte, of the leaden despot of Austria, any Government in the world, would be deformed and outraged by the introduction of such a feature as this. I read from the eighth section of this bill:

Any person who, under color of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation or custom, shall, in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion—

Not where it continues to be interrupted, but where it has been interrupted, no odds how long before—subject, or cause to be subjected, any negro, mulatto, freedman, refugee, or other person, on account of race or color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or for any other cause, to the deprivation of any civil right secured to white persons, or to any other or different punishment than white persons are subject to for the commission of like acts or offenses, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both; and it shall be the duty of the officers and agents of this bureau to take jurisdiction of and hear and determine all offenses committed against the provisions of this section, and also of all cases affecting negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or other persons who are discriminated against in any of the particulars mentioned in the preceding section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the President of the United States, through the War Department, shall prescribe.

The previous section provides that the freedman shall be entitled to all the civil rights and privileges that a white person is entitled to. Now let me give you an example. It has been made a crime in Kentucky—and I hope it always will be; it shall never cease to be with my consent, at least—for any negro to intermarry with a white person. It is made a penal offense for our county court clerk to issue a license to a negro to intermarry with a white person. It is made a penal offense for a preacher of the Gospel to solemnize the rites of marriage between a negro and a white person. Suppose that under this famous bill a negro applies to the county court clerk of Bourbon county for a marriage license to intermarry with a white woman, and the clerk refuses because the law does not permit such an alliance—it denounces it as a crime, and it punishes all persons who assist in the perpetration of that crime as criminals, penally. He refuses under the sanction of the laws to grant the license. What does the negro do? He goes and makes complaint to this bureau; this bureau sends its corporal's guard with fixed bayonets to the clerk's office and commands the clerk to issue this license against the highest penal sanctions of our law. The clerk refuses; what do they do? They imprison him, they take him into custody, the bureau assumes to adjudge the case, to punish him for obedience to the laws of his own State which he has sworn to support and which he has given bond that he will support.

This is one of the consequences of this law, and it will speedily arise in our State. It will give rise to inevitable conflict between the jurisdiction of our State officers and courts and the Freedmen's Bureau. What does the clerk do? He applies to a judge for a writ of prohibition to prevent this interference by the Freedmen's Bureau with his official duties, which he is performing according to the laws of the State; the judge grants the writ of prohibition. What then takes place? This Freedmen's Bureau sends an additional military guard; they seize upon the judge, they strip the emine of justice with which his shoulders have been clothed by as gallant a State as there is in America; and because he issues a writ of prohibition to prevent this Freedmen's Bureau from compelling one of the ministerial officers of the State to violate his oath of office and his duty under the law, because he issues his writ of prohibition to prevent the bureau from interfering without any authority of valid law in such a flagrant case, they carry that judge to a prison.

I will give you another example. It is there made a capital offense for a negro to violate the person of a white woman. The gentleman from Kansas who replied to my honorable colleague the other day [Mr. POMEROY] may expect the day to come, but he will never live, and the man is not now born who will live, to see the day when there will be an alteration of the law of Kentucky in that respect. The same offense committed by a white man is a felony, punishable by confinement in the penitentiary. Committed by a negro, it is punishable by death; and in some cases the offense is committed under circumstances of atrocity that a mob lashed to fury by the enormity of the crime, as in St. Louis a few years ago, seize the criminal, wrest him from the hands of justice, and burn him at the stake. I do not know, and I do not believe that such an outrage upon the forms of justice was ever perpetrated in Kentucky; but, sir, you may pass this measure, you may send your Freedmen's Bureau there backed by a standing army; but whenever the case occurs the people of Kentucky will punish the black criminal by hanging him, and all the Freedmen's Bureaus that could be created by Congress will be insufficient to give him immunity from such a just punishment.

I could mention a few other cases in our penal laws. I could mention many cases in which there would be controversies between a free negro and a white man involving contract, property rights, in all the various forms which they assume in courts of justice, and in which the white man and the negro are equally by the Constitution guaranteed the right to trial by jury if the amount in controversy exceeded twenty dollars; and yet the honorable Senator from Illinois vaunted so boldly and defiantly yesterday that the law was constitutional! I said, and I now repeat, that this measure was designed for Kentucky; it was concocted by the honorable Senator from Illinois with the assistance of the degenerate son of Kentucky who now occupies the position of Attorney General. I have heard of no individual case of magnanimity, of mercy, of justice, being applied for to the executive department of the Government from Kentucky, with two or three exceptions, where he has not thrown his whole influence, personal and official, against it. I have known of no outrage upon the constitution of Kentucky or upon the Constitution of the United States; I have known of no law of Congress since he has been in office; I have known of no administrative measure of policy that could at all be brought to bear upon Kentucky, that was calculated to dishonor, to degrade, and to outrage his native State, that has not received the sanction and the earnest support of this unlined son of that noble State. Sir, I cannot express the depths of my scorn and detestation toward a Kentuckian who can play such a part. I can only excuse it upon the plea that he knoweth not what he is doing.

Mr. President, I have not the bill to which this is an amendment before me, but it restricts, by its terms, the Freedmen's Bureau to the States that were in rebellion. By its terms it exonerates and excludes Kentucky. Some month ago the Freedmen's Bureau was introduced into Kentucky, as I have understood, with the official and personal sanction of the Attorney General, when it was without the authority of a fragment of law; when it was a naked and monstrous military usurpation; when there was not even an unconstitutional and invalid law to give it any sanction or any excuse. And what was done? I will read what I understand to be a creation, in part, of the brain of the Attorney General:

"Agency of the Freedmen's Bureau for Covington and vicinity."

This was published some three or four weeks ago:

"Pursuant to orders from Brevet Major General C. B. Fiske, assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau for Kentucky and Tennessee, dated Nashville, Tennessee, December 25, 1865, the undersigned assumes the office of superintendent of the affairs of the bureau for Covington and vicinity."

There was no bureau at Covington, there was none in the State by authority of law, and where there was no law it was a plain, naked, flagrant usurpation, which anybody had a right to resist.

"The principal objects of this bureau are the promotion of productive industry, the settlement of those so lately slaves in homes of their own, with the guarantee of their absolute freedom and their rights to justice before the law, as set forth in the proclamation of the President and the laws of Congress, the dissemination of virtuous intelligence, and to aid in permanently establishing peace and securing prosperity to those who were until lately slaves."

"The ratification of the constitutional amendment forever abolishing slavery in the United States."

I am not disposed to dispute that proposition—

"having been officially announced to the country by proclamation of the Secretary of State, dated December 18, 1865, this bureau extends its supervision over persons recently held as slaves in the State of Kentucky. In the further discharge of the duties of this office the following rules and regulations will be observed."

Now, I will read the rules and regulations that this satrap, this military minion of power, dared to promulge in the State of Kentucky for the overthrow of its government and its laws:

"1. No fixed rates of wages will be prescribed by the superintendent of affairs here, but no community or combination of people will be permitted to fix rates."

That may be very well; but by what authority, by what warrant does he assume to make such a regulation? If it was to become necessary our State Legislature would do it. They are the judges whether it shall be done or not. I have seen one hundred slaves and free negroes parties to suits, and more in my State; I have been the counsel of fifty myself; and I never saw a negro, slave or free, in a court in Kentucky that he did not receive the fullest justice from a court and jury, and never, where he had a specious case, that he did not enlist the sympathies of the entire court-house, with the exception of his adversary and the counsel of his adversary. But I will read on:

"2. Parties can make any trade or agreement that is satisfactory to themselves, and so long as advantage is not taken of the ignorance of the freed people to deprive them of a fair and reasonable compensation for their labor, there will be no interference."

"3. Wages will be secured by a lien on the crops raised, or by good sureties, if the employer's circumstances are such as to make it doubtful as to his ability to meet the contract."

Are not these legislative powers? Are they not legislative powers to govern a State that maintains the same relations toward the Union and the General Government that the State of Illinois does? By what right does this military dictator presume to promulge his code of laws in that State? But I shall read on:

"4. Contracts hereafter must be in writing; but contracts at present existing, whether verbal or otherwise, will not be interfered with, except to compel, if necessary, both parties to comply in good faith with agreements."

Oh, what a chancellor he is to execute specifically a contract!—

"and to settle disputes when they may arise. It will be a part of the business of this office to fairly adjust the labor question, and to see that contracts are equitable and their inviolability enforced against the employer and employe."

He is absorbing all power, legislative, judicial, and executive—playing the autocrat.

"Persons who neglect or refuse to make written contracts with the freed people employed by them will be required, should any dispute arise as to compensation, to pay the highest wages given for the same kind of labor in their neighborhood or section of country."

He dictates how the contract shall be made, whether it shall be in writing or verbally.

"The laborer must work under the direction of his employer, must be industrious and faithful, and not leave the plantation or place of his employment in working hours, without permission, unless he is cruelly treated."

"5. Parents are advised that they are responsible for their children, and the children for their aged and decrepit parents, and must labor for their support; and in making contracts this fact must be taken into consideration. Aged and infirm freedmen, who have no means of support, not any relations to whom they can rightfully look for the same, will be provided for by the county authorities."

The county authorities do it, and have always done it; have done it from the origin of our State, and they are not to be hastened and will not be hastened by this military dictator, nor by his bayonets, however sharp they may be—"but the compulsory removal of the aged and infirm colored people from their homes by their former masters will not be permitted; and plantations and homes, from which the old and faithful freed people are driven away will be seized and treated as abandoned lands and property, for the benefit of this homeless and helpless class of people."

My county was the second slaveholding county in the State in point of numbers. I have never known there the owner of an infirm or decrepit slave that did not make provision for his support; and where the owner refused to do so the law was compulsory. We have an act of the Legislature which imposes the duty upon the county court to see that the obligation is enforced upon the owner of old, infirm, and decrepit slaves to support them; and if all these resources fail, if a decrepit slave becomes a county pauper, he is supported in the poor-house of the county, or by a charge upon the levy of the county. That is the case all over the State of Kentucky; and yet, with all these provisions, this Attorney General urges on the Senator from Illinois to report such a measure as this. But here you have long ago, by your military officers, in defiance of the Constitution and law, wrested from the owners of slaves their property in those slaves. We cared nothing about your law of Congress freeing the wives and children of slaves who had enlisted in the Army. We knew that was a brutum fulmen; and our supreme court have already decided that it is unconstitutional and inoperative. We knew that any court of any intelligence would render the same decision; and if that decision was not rendered there could be a revisory tribunal reached that would decide it to be unconstitutional. We maintained, too, at least it was my position, but that is now superseded and absorbed by the amendment to the Constitution which, I admit, has the effect to liberate all slaves, but without that amendment to the Constitution you had no slave, not a solitary one, in America liberated. But I care not now for that question; I consider now that they are all liberated. There is a widow and there is an orphan, there is an old and decrepit white man who has spent his life in industry and toil; he has a little land and he had some slaves. You have taken all his slaves from him except the old and decrepit; and if he is not able to maintain them, here is a provision of this Government in Kentucky, which a military subordinate has organized to override the constitution and laws and courts of that State, which declares that if his old and decrepit slave, from whatever motive, inability or any other motive, is forced to leave the house and the home of his owner, that house and that home shall be treated as abandoned property, shall be seized, and that aged owner who has earned it by the sweat of his brow and by the exertions of his arm and his sinews and muscle, shall be deprived of it, and it shall be given up to these negroes.

"6. Judicial officers and magistrates are requested to signify their acceptance or rejection of the proposition that they act as agents for this bureau in the administration of justice, and in all cases where the civil officers decline such adjudication it will become necessary for this office to administer justice in all cases as would otherwise be adjudicated by such civil officers."

This office to administer justice in such cases as otherwise would be adjudicated! The Attorney General knows the state of things in Kentucky. He knows that this arrangement is in force; it has received his sanction, personal and official. And now you are to pass this law to give a semi-validity to this monstrous system of tyranny and oppression under the guise of a military bureau backed by bayonets, in the State of Kentucky—

"and in so doing will be governed by the laws of this State, except so far as those laws make a distinction on account of color."

Oh, yes! And here the honorable Senator's bill says to Kentucky, "Whenever you shall reform and modify your laws so as to give the negro equal civil rights"—and the next demand will be equal political rights—"we will then remove this screw from you." Sir, this measure is intended to place Kentucky and the southern States on the rack; the thumb-screw and the pincers are to be applied to their muscles and nerves for purposes of torture, and this torture is to be continued and applied, and applied until these States are subjugated, enslaved, unmanned, ignobly whipped into a compliance with these degrading conditions. Why, Mr. President, I should suppose that this terrible contest had caused the people of the different States and sections of the United States to become acquainted with each other. Is that the way to reunite the States, to introduce peace and fraternity and brotherhood among the lately warring States and sections? How long has that system been attempted in Ireland? From the days of Henry II, and especially from the time that William of Orange crossed the Boyne water. And what was the effect? There were discriminating laws made there against the Catholic Irish. They felt that those laws were in violation of all their natural rights, and in degradation of all their manhood. They opposed them from century to century, from age to age, from generation to generation; and the Iron Duke himself, when Prime Minister of England, was at length made, by the determination and constancy of this long struggle of a brave and a gallant and an unconquered and an unconquerable people against tyranny, to yield to their just demands. What did he say? Said he, I have seen as much war as most men; he had been the conqueror of Napoleon, and the honors and rewards of Europe and its potentates were being showered down upon him; he was the acknowledged greatest military captain of the age, if not of any age; and, said he, "The most of my military service has been in civil war; and I tell you, my lords"—making a speech in the House of Lords—"that if the sacrifice of my life would prevent civil war in this empire only for six weeks I would cheerfully make that sacrifice."

Do the men that urge forward this measure by a disfranchisement of eleven States by a dismemberment of the Union think that the representatives of those States when they get into their places here, and their people, will ever recognize the validity, much less the justice and the binding obligation, of your amendments to the Constitution and these measures of policy that are adopted to grind them to the dust? No, Mr. President; they will regard them as the Irish did the oaths excluding Roman Catholics from office, from a share in their Government from a right to vote, and justly. These men do not want fraternity; they do not wish a reunion—not for the present. It is not their purpose. Their purpose is to keep up the fury and the tempest of passion upon the cry that the war is not yet over, although the President has proclaimed it to be so, and although you are appointing and approving appointments into all the southern States daily. They want this commotion, this turmoil, this fury of passion that dethrones reason, that destroys all the charities of the human heart, that subverts patriotism and every duty of life, private or public—they want this mad frenzy of passion to continue, and they want under it to be justified or excused by their States and constituency for the dissolution of the Union that they have made, and for this lawless, violent, unconstitutional exclusion of eleven States from their representation on the two floors of Congress.

Oh, say gentlemen, they will come in after awhile; it shall be done. When will it be done? When you have passed through the two Houses of Congress by a vote of two thirds some of the most obnoxious propositions as amendments to the Constitution; when you have passed your despotic suffrage bill for this District where there are scarcely ten white citizens who are not opposed to negro suffrage; when you have imposed the same odious principle upon the southern States which most of the northern States reject with scorn; when you have authorized this infamous Freedmen's Bureau, the very device of the spirit of oppression and of injustice, to go into all the States; when you have passed the kindred measure to give the negro "equality before the law," in the hackneyed phrase of the Senator from Massachusetts, and when you have passed all the other unjust and outrageous measures which you may deem necessary for the preservation of your party ascendancy that you may hold on to power.

Mr. President, I tell these gentlemen they do not want reunion at present. Why? You, sir, [Mr. Howe in the chair] represent a great and growing and gallant young State of the Northwest. Suppose all New England was held out of its representation in the Senate and in the other House as the eleven States are, where then would be the sonorous voice of the Senator from Massachusetts? Where would be his protest, delivered in thunder tones in this Chamber and resounding through all the mountains of New England? Suppose the great Northwest were excluded. Mr. President, there are many ups and downs in life. Political parties in countries having the form of free government are especially liable to vicissitude. It is an accident almost that the party who are now in power are not the party in rebellion. If the Lecompton constitution, against which I was a determined foe, had been passed, and Kansas had been admitted into the Union under that constitution, a revolt of the free States would certainly have taken place, and every man, not excepting the honorable Senator from Illinois, who is now shouting for these monstrous infractions of the Constitution, these fearful usurpations of power, all these measures of oppression which we are denouncing, would have been loud in denouncing them. In the ups and downs of parties, it may come to pass in a few years that the tables will be turned, and then the gentlemen who constitute the Black Republican party, and who are now so magisterially wielding power in this Government and all over the United States, may be made to take that very Procrustes's bed which they have constructed for their adversaries. How would they lie upon it? I hope to live to see this party hurled from power; but I hope never to live to see the day when any party, its successor, shall seek to practice the same enormous abuses of power, and the same oppression upon its members, that they have practiced upon those who are opposed to them.

Mr. President, I am no party man. I am fighting this battle upon my own hook. I am fighting it under the inspiration and the teachings of Mr. Clay, when he proclaimed his noble sentiment that ought to be deeply graven upon the heart of every American statesman and legislator: "I would rather be right than be President;" and it was true as it was noble. Sir, if in the short remnant of life that is left to me any party should dethrone the present party in power, and should seek to turn the same engines of oppression upon it that it has so lavishly and unscrupulously attempted to enforce against others, I would be as much opposed to the exercise of those powers and the toleration of those abuses then as I am now.

Mr. President, that great man to whom I have referred, in 1821, averted one civil convulsion on the Missouri question, enforcing by his matchless eloquence and his irresistible power over men that compromise measure through Congress. In 1833, when the clouds of war rose again in the South and threatened to burst in fury over the whole land, he averted a second time the terrible calamity of civil war. In 1850, after the Mexican war had closed by the acquisition of a large scope of country, no man had wisdom or statesmanship or courage or power to adjust the vexed question that then arose except Mr. Clay. He again commanded the tempest not to rise, and the country had a further continuance of peace. Mr. President, if it had pleased Providence in its bounty, in its goodness, to this country, to have spared the life of that great man, and also Mr. Webster, they would have averted again the terrible calamity that has convulsed this country and that has imperiled, I fear forever, constitutional government and the liberties of the people.

Mr. President, it was the matchless eloquence and the unequalled statesmanship of that great man that enabled him to achieve those great results for the common good and peace of our country. It was his mighty power over men, it was the breadth and depth of his patriotism, it was his genius and the fiery grandeur of his soul, and his most marvelous command over men, that enabled him to effect these great consummations. He was always for compromise, for peace, for pouring oil on the troubled waters. He wanted no civil strife, no sectional war, no war that would shake the pillars of the Constitution to their deep base, and perhaps bring down the edifice of liberty forever. If the present generation would look back to his example, his noble principles, and his peerless and expanding patriotism that knew no section, no parties when the country and its Government were in peril, and would act a little in the spirit of the example and counsels of that great man, it seems to me that the wounds deep, bleeding, and immedicable as they seem to be, of the country might speedily be healed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no desire to delay the passage of the bill by saying anything on its merits; but a statement has been made to me by a person from South Carolina bearing a letter from an acquaintance of mine in the House of Representatives, that I desire to submit to the Senate for its action. It seems that one section of this bill, probably the fourth section, relating to the title to certain lands in South Carolina, has excited a good deal of attention in that State. It is known that that State has no Representative here, no one to speak for the white people or the black people there. The Governor of South Carolina, under the reconstructing movement, has written a long letter intended for Congress; which is now in the hands of a printer for the purpose of being printed. What its contents are I do not know; but at any rate it bears upon that direct question. The gentleman who bore that letter from Governor Orr told me that it would be printed by to-morrow morning. I submit the question to the Senate, whether they are willing to postpone the final vote on this bill until that document can be before them; I have no opinion in regard to that point. I do not know that a perusal of the document would change the opinion of any member of the Senate in regard to the bill; but it is due to Governor Orr, and it is due to the subject, that I should mention the matter to the Senate, as I promised to do. I do not think any harm will result from our laying this bill over informally until to-morrow; and by to-morrow morning the paper to which I have alluded, whatever it may be, will be laid upon our tables. I submit the matter to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it was a simple question of laying over the bill until to-morrow, and no public considerations were involved in it, I should presume there would be no disposition to hasten a vote upon it to-day: but the condition of the bill is such that it cannot now be amended; and this is not the last action upon the bill; when we pass it it goes to the House of Representatives, to be there considered, and whatever considerations may be presented in the letter of the Governor of the reorganized authorities in South Carolina can go before the committee of the House of Representatives. If this were final action it would be different. If this were a House bill now upon its passage here, which was to become a law and pass from our consideration, and an application was made by a person having some interest in its provisions to be heard, it would be different. But this is not the final action to be taken by Congress upon the bill. It will go to the House of Representatives after we pass it for consideration there. We cannot change or alter the bill at its present stage without a reconsideration of our action and opening it for amendments generally, or perhaps without a recommitment of it; and the result would be that we should have over again the debate which has occupied the Senate for the last week or two. It is known to the Senator from Ohio that we were delayed nearly the whole day yesterday on amendments that were proposed, and upon which the yeas and nays were repeatedly called. Under the circumstances I do not see that anything is to be lost to the people of South Carolina by our acting to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose there will not be any objection from any quarter to the proposition which the Senator from Illinois now makes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have made no proposition. I was answering the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio. I think that, under the circumstances, in the present condition of the public business of the country, and when nothing is to be lost to the parties who wish to bring some facts to the consideration of Congress by the passage of the bill to-day, inasmuch as they can bring this matter before the House of Representatives, it is unreasonable to ask that we should longer delay action upon the bill.

I should in the ordinary course of things, as I am upon the floor and have charge of this bill, feel it incumbent upon me to reply, in the conclusion of this debate, to some of the objections which have been urged against the passage of the bill; but so much time has been occupied, as I conceive, in dilatory motions, and what cannot but be regarded as a debate designed to prevent action upon the bill, that I do not feel myself justified in occupying any considerable time in replying either to the Senator from Kentucky or to other Senators who have spoken against the passage of the bill. I will hastily, however, as it is not quite three o'clock, and designing to conclude all I have to say by that hour, reply to all I think there is in the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky.

He has strained his voice to the utmost and talked about the fury of passion which governs the Senate, of the monstrous infractions of the Constitution, and of the Black Republican party! Now, does the Senator suppose that these epithets and these high-sounding words make the bill unconstitutional? Has anybody displayed half the fury of passion that he has? Has anybody been so much excited as he has? Who has delayed the Senate by the fury of passion and denunciation but the Senator from Kentucky himself? Sir, the declaration that this is a monstrous infraction of the Constitution does not make it so; nor does the declaration of the Senator that because some of the States in the Union are not represented here, it is therefore unconstitutional, prove that to be so.

That is his first position. The very statement of an argument is sometimes its most perfect refutation. The Senator assumes here and argues that because some of the States of the Union, having been in rebellion against the Government, and not yet restored in their relations to the Government, are not represented here, it is therefore unconstitutional for us to pass a law! What is the Senator from Kentucky here for? Why does he not go home? Why is he sitting here but to pass laws? Is it unconstitutional to pass this bill because some States are not represented here? Why, sir, what sort of a Government would it be if some State, by withdrawing its representation, could take away the constitutional power of the Congress of the United States to pass a law? The absurdity of the proposition is such that it needs not to be argued to be refuted.

But he says that there is a clear violation of the Constitution in this bill, because judicial power is by it conferred upon the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. He says it is admitted that such power is conferred, and then he reads the clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that the judicial power shall be vested in a Supreme Court and inferior courts, to be established by Congress, and he says these officers of the Freedmen's Bureau are not the courts contemplated by the Constitution; and he reads another clause to show that the right of trial by jury is secured to parties, and he says no jury trial is provided for here. Of course not; but how plain a statement shall answer that whole argument.

Are there not other provisions of the Constitution? Has the Senator from Kentucky never read that the Congress of the United States shall have authority to call forth the militia to put down insurrection and rebellion? Does not the Senator from Kentucky know that from eleven States of this Union every court has been expelled and driven out? And could anything be more absurd and preposterous than for him to talk about trials before the ordinary courts of justice, where every court of justice has been expelled by force of arms? It would not be more absurd for the Senator to contend that when the hundreds of thousands of men met in battle array you should first impanel a jury, and try a traitor, and see whether he was guilty of treason, before you could shoot or hang him? When the time comes that the judicial authorities of the country are overborne, when they are expelled, and armed men rise up in opposition to the civil tribunals, and they have no power to put down the armed resistance, then the military power is called into play, and by military authority the armed insurrection is crushed and put down. The military power governs and controls where no courts can exist. It is under this provision of the Constitution, authorizing judicial powers to be conferred upon military tribunals which have been exercised for the last five years, that judicial authority is now to be conferred upon the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau. Does that Senator deny the authority to hold a court-martial; does he deny the authority of a military commission to try and punish men in rebellious districts where no civil courts can exist, and where all judicial authority is overborne by arms? If he does deny it, he denies the authority to have any Government at all in those districts, and we should have a state of anarchy and confusion.

The Senator says the laws of Kentucky forbid a white man or woman marrying a negro, and that these laws of Kentucky are to exist forever; that severe penalties are imposed in the State of Kentucky against amalgamation between the white and black races. Well, sir, I am sorry that in noble Kentucky there is such a disposition to amalgamation that nothing but penalties and punishments can prevent it. But, sir, it is a misrepresentation of this bill to say that it interferes with those laws. I answered that argument the other day when it was presented by the Senator from Indiana. The bill provides for dealing out the same punishment to people of every color and every race; and if the law of Kentucky forbids the white man to marry the black woman I presume it equally forbids the black woman to marry the white man, and the punishment is alike upon each. All this bill provides for is that there shall be no discrimination in punishments on account of color; and unless the Senator from Kentucky wants to punish the negro more severely for marrying a white person than a white for marrying a negro, the bill will not interfere with his law.

But he says the Freedmen's Bureau did not originally embrace Kentucky, and it is a monstrous usurpation to extend it over Kentucky, and thereupon he assaults the Attorney General, who, I suppose, is capable of defending himself.

Mr. WILSON. If he has a chance.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Even without a chance. I do not imagine he will be very seriously damaged by what the Senator from Kentucky has said. Did the Senator ever look at the original law to see whether it reached Kentucky? What is its language?

"That there is hereby established in the War Department, to continue during the present war of rebellion, and for one year thereafter, a Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, to which shall be committed, as hereinafter provided, the supervision and management of all abandoned lands, and the control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from rebel States, or from any district of country within the territory embraced in the operations of the Army."

Was not Paducah embraced in the operations of the Army? The original Freedmen's Bureau bill was not confined to the rebellious States; it was confined to the refugees and freedmen from those States and from localities occupied by the Army, and that is all there is in the present bill. It extends to refugees and freedmen wherever found; so did the original bill, and there is no usurpation in the authority which has been assumed in the State of Kentucky.

What I have now said embraces, I believe, all the points of the long gentleman's speech except the sound and fury, and that I will not undertake to reply to.

Several SENATORS. You mean the short gentleman's long speech.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Did I say short? If so, it was a very great mistake to speak of any thing connected with the Senator from Kentucky as short. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. It is long enough to reach you.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The hour having arrived which was agreed upon by the Senate for taking the vote upon this bill I shall not continue my remarks, but trust that we shall now come to a vote upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no purpose to debate the bill, and rise with no such view; but I suggest whether it would not be better to let it go over until to-morrow. It makes no difference in the result.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have already given my opinion that there is no reason for its going over.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was not addressing myself so much to the Senator as he may suppose; I was appealing to the Senate. I understand from my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. SUMNER] that there is a committee here from the Governor of South Carolina with a communication from him on the subject of this bill; I do not know what it is; but all the request that is made is that we shall be put in possession of the information they communicate before the final vote is taken. It is true the communication may be presented in the House of Representatives; but then it may be that the House would find nothing in that communication to change their opinion in regard to the bill, when the Senate might think otherwise and might change its action if it had the subject before it. I suppose that whether the bill passes to-day or to-morrow can make little or no difference so far as the bill is concerned. It really seems to me that when the Governor of a State, the people of which are interested in a bill, asks an opportunity to allow them to be heard, and asks for that purpose only a delay for a few hours, it would be but proper, unless some public interest is to be defeated by it, that that request should be complied with. I make the suggestion with no purpose of defeating the bill—I have no such purpose; I have said all I propose to say about the bill—but merely that the Senate should be in a situation to decide understandingly on the whole matter. It may be that there are matters connected with this subject, as far as relates to South Carolina, of which the Senate now know nothing, that would, if we had them before us, change the views of the Senate in some respects.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will not be too late for the Senator from Maryland to move a reconsideration to-morrow if he wishes to do so, in case the bill be now passed and there shall be found to be anything in this communication requiring it. All there is about it is that some gentleman who has arrived here in the city of Washington tells us that he has got a communication from the Governor of South Carolina in regard to the abandoned lands there, and he asks Congress to delay its public business and postpone a measure which has been considered for two weeks, that he may have a letter published. The letter, I understand, is not addressed to Congress. I presume it is a very valuable letter; I should like to see it; I should like to get all the information I can. I have not seen the letter, but I am informed by the person who brings it here that he has a letter addressed to the President. It is not addressed to Congress. When he applied to me I told him that if he would furnish me a copy of the letter I would have it read in the Senate, but he informed me that as it was not an official letter, addressed to Congress, he did not feel justified in doing so. I see no reason for delaying the legislation of Congress on any such assumption. This is not a finality. I understand that the letter, whatever it is, is to be published, and the Senator can move a reconsideration to-morrow; or if there is anything in the letter worthy of consideration, the other House can consider it. This, I think, to say the least of it, is not a very modest request to lay before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am very sorry to differ from the honorable Senator from Illinois. Perhaps I am as little likely to be immodest as he is. I am not sure that I have done anything that would justify the honorable Senator in saying that the request I make is not a modest one. It is a request merely that we should defer final action until the State of South Carolina through its Governor shall be heard. It is true—I was aware of that—that a motion to reconsider can be made in the morning; but as I do not propose to vote for the bill, I do not like to vote for it merely for the purpose of being in a position to be able to move a reconsideration. I have no objection, however, to the course suggested by the honorable Senator if he will agree to-morrow morning to move a reconsideration. The Senator will vote for the bill, and if he will move a reconsideration, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. CONNESS. I will do that for the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well, then; I have no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is due to myself to say that in using the words "modest request," I did not intend to apply my remark to the Senator from Maryland. I applied it to the request that came from the agent.

Mr. CONNESS. I so understood.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think my words would have justified that application. I certainly made no such application. I thought it was not, to say the least, a very modest request on the part of the agent who came here with a letter addressed to the President of the United States to come to members of the Senate and ask them not to pass a bill until he could have that letter published, and laid before them, when it was not a letter addressed to Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am perfectly satisfied. I should not have supposed that the honorable member intended any slight to me, but I thought it barely possible that it might be understood otherwise by persons within the hearing of the honorable Senator. I know him well enough to know that he is incapable of offering any offense designedly to any member of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 37, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Wright—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Nesmith, and Willey—3.

So the bill was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no amendment be proposed to the title of the bill, it will stand as reported, namely: a bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the title by substituting this for it: a bill to appropriate a portion of the public land in some of the southern States and to authorize the United States Government to purchase lands to supply farms and build houses upon them for the freed negroes; to promote strife and conflict between the white and black races; and to invest the Freedmen's Bureau with unconstitutional powers to aid and assist the blacks, and to introduce military power to prevent the Commissioner and other officers of said bureau from being restrained or held responsible in civil courts for their illegal acts in rendering such aid and assistance to the blacks; and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the proposed amendment is not in order. The Chair will state that the original title of the bill will stand as the title, unless objected to.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Chair to intimate on what ground the amendment is not in order. Why is the proposition to amend the title which I have proposed not in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the proposed amendment is not in order, as it is inconsistent with the character of the bill, in effect pronouncing it unconstitutional; pronouncing it a bill to promote strife, sedition, and tumult; it is certainly derogatory to the Senate, a reproach to its members, to have passed such a bill. If the Senate so understood it, they would not have passed it. The proposed title of the bill is not consistent with its provisions as understood by the Senate, and as the Chair is bound to understand it—it is not descriptive of its true character.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not know that it was in the competency of the Chair to decide that question. I supposed that if the Senate thought such was the character of the amendment the Senate would vote it down: that is the function of the Senate to decide that matter, and not the function of the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is certainly competent for the Senator to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The Chair is very happy to say that its decision is not final.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not understand that the Chair has the right to make any such decision, and for that reason I do not make any such appeal.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe there is nothing before the Senate. I move that the—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the title of the bill. The Chair does not mean to cut off any Senator from having his views brought in full before the Senate, and decided by the Senate, instead of being cut off by any decision of the Chair.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think the opinion of the Chair has been well pronounced. The Chair is the representative of the dignity of the Senate, and is to say what becomes the body. This is a matter that concerns our own dignity as Senators. The Chair has well pronounced. The suggestion that is involved in the amendment is an insult to the action of the Senate; or if not an insult it is at least offensive. It was therefore well adjudged by the Presiding Officer that it is not within the rules of order, because it is the business of the officer who presides over this body to see that the dignity of the body is maintained at all times.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe that matter is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is yet upon the title of the bill. Unless objection be made the title will stand as reported by the committee. That stands as the title.

PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 61) to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and furnish the means of their vindication.

Mr. HOWE. I do not propose to object to the taking up of that bill at the present time, but I wish to remind the Senate that on the tenth day of this month I had the honor to introduce a joint resolution, and was allowed by the Senate to submit some comments upon it. That is not a very unusual procedure. There have been since that time, however, two or three speeches made in opposition to the resolution. It has not yet reached the committee. The Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] on the day succeeding that on which I introduced the resolution, spoke upon it, and at the close of his remarks I took the floor with the view of submitting some brief reply. Senators about me asked me to give way to a motion to adjourn, and reluctantly I did so. On the next day, it will be remembered, the Senator from Maryland was obliged to be out of town, and at his request I postponed the consideration of the resolution that he might be present when I did attempt the reply which I contemplated. Before his return the bill which has just been passed by the Senate intervened, and since that time I have not ventured to ask the Senate to renew the consideration of that resolution. I rise now for the purpose of saying that to-morrow at one o'clock I shall ask the Senate to take up that resolution and allow me to submit some remarks in reply to the Senator from Maryland, and also to my colleague, and then I shall be entirely willing that it shall go to the committee, as I proposed in the first instance, or that any other disposition may be made of it which the Senate shall see fit to make. I shall not object, of course, to the taking up of the bill of the Senator from Illinois at the present time, but I hope to-morrow he will not make any objection to the request which I now submit.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I think that after the time we have devoted to-day and heretofore to the bill just disposed of, the Senator from Illinois ought to allow us to adjourn now without taking up any more of his bills. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DIXON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not until we get this bill up. The bill is not yet up. Let the bill come up, and then I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky is that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I withdraw it if the Senator from Connecticut wishes to press his motion.

Mr. DIXON. I renew my motion for an executive session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator will not press that until we get up this bill, and then I shall not object. I wish the bill to be taken up that it may be the order of the day for tomorrow.

Mr. DIXON. I withdraw my motion at present.

The motion of Mr. TRUMBULL was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. DIXON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time consumed therein the doors were opened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 25, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORTS OF GENERALS GRANT AND SCHURZ.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report, and demanded the previous question on the adoption thereof:

Resolved, That twenty-five thousand copies of the report of Generals U. S. Grant and Carl Schurz, with the accompanying documents upon the condition of the late rebellious States, be printed for the use of members of this House.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the regular order of business.

BUREAU OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. MOULTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the Bureau of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this House—

First, the amount of money that has been received from any source by his bureau since he has had charge of the same.

Secondly, a statement in detail of the disbursements and expenditures of said bureau during the same time.

Thirdly, the yearly cost to the Government of said bureau, including every expenditure connected with the same.

Mr. MOULTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be requested to consider the expediency of so amending the national banking act as to provide by law that in case any bank desires to surrender its charter and close up its business, it shall be enabled to do so within a reasonable time.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the laws for the collection of internal revenue; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

REMUNERATION FOR LOSSES AT SEA.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for remunerating owners of property thrown overboard or otherwise destroyed at sea in order to preserve human life in cases of shipwreck or other peril, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. FINCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Hon. Charles Pollett, contesting the seat now held by Hon. COLUMBUS DELANO, from the thirteenth district of Ohio, be entitled to the privileges of the floor during the pendency of the consideration of said contest.

Mr. FINCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RESERVED LANDS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. FERRY submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas by reservations under various railroad grants, and subsequent extensions of time for the construction of railroads, large tracts of land in the State of Michigan are withheld from market, to the detriment of the State, by seriously obstructing settlement and vitally impeding its growth and wealth; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to consider the propriety of restoring, at an early day, these lands to market at a price not exceeding that fixed by Government for even and adjoining sections, and the proceeds thereof held, instead of the lands, for such railroad purposes, the State concurring; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FARQUHAR, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be requested to report an amendment to the election laws of the District of Columbia with proper provisions excluding from the right of suffrage all persons who have voluntarily borne arms against the United States during the late rebellion.

TEST OATH.

Mr. BENJAMIN submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it appears from reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War to the Senate and House of Representatives, in response to certain resolutions, that certain persons have been appointed to and are performing the duties of officers of the Government of the United States without having taken the oath required by law: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire and report to this House if any of the officers so appointed are required by law to execute official bonds, and if so, if the securities to such bonds are liable for any breach thereof.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DAVID T. STEPHENSON.

Mr. KERR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of David T. Stephenson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HORSE RAILROAD IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the joint resolution of the House authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of a portion of the military reserve on the St. Clair river, in the State of Michigan, for railroad purposes.

Mr. SCHENCK. The town of Port Huron—Port Huron City, as it is called—in Michigan, is at a distance of two miles from the depot of the railroad leading to it. There is a military reserve belonging to the United States lying between the railroad depot and the town. It is desired to have the privilege of running cars through this military reserve in order to reach the town from the depot, for the convenience of the inhabitants of the town and passengers on that railroad.

The whole matter has been referred to the Secretary of War, to ascertain whether there exists in the War Department any objection whatever to granting this privilege. It is ascertained that there is no reason why it should not be granted. It will not interfere in any way with the use of the ground for public purposes, and there is no objection that the committee can ascertain to granting the privilege.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to hear the joint resolution read.

The Clerk read the joint resolution.

It authorizes the Secretary of War to grant to Gurdon O. Williams, of the city of Detroit, in the State of Michigan, and his associates, the use of so much of the military reserve on the St. Clair river, in the State of Michigan, known as the site of Fort Gratiot, as is necessary for extending a horse railroad from Port Huron City to the depot of the Port Huron and Detroit railroad, at such rental and upon such terms and conditions as to him may seem proper, reserving to the United States, however, the right of removing the rails, ties, and other parts of said road whenever the Secretary of War shall direct, without any claim or right for damages on the part of the said Williams and associates, or their legal representatives.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The petition of eighteen soldiers who have lost arms or legs in the military service for increase of pensions; and

The petition of Hon. T. W. Powell and fifty-six others, citizens of Ohio, for pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812.

The motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATION IN CONGRESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That it be proposed to the several States of the Union to amend the Constitution of the United States, in the first clause of the second section of the first article thereof, so as to make the same read as follows:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have such qualifications as shall be prescribed from time to time by a general law of Congress to be enacted for that purpose.

Also, to amend the last clause of the eighth section of the first article thereof, so as to make the same read as follows:

To make all laws which shall be necessary for carrying into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof, and enforcing all obligations, provisions, or disabilities imposed thereby on the several States composing the same.

Mr. LE BLOND objected.

CENSUS OF MANUFACTURES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a tabular statement of the manufactures in the United States, in response to a resolution from the House of January 17, 1866; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOGAN moved that twenty thousand extra copies of said communication be printed for the use of the House; which motion, under the law, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

NORTON'S POST OFFICE STAMP.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General relative to Norton's post stamp; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS and Mr. RITTER demanded the regular order of business.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the consideration of the following joint resolution reported by the joint committee on reconstruction:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE — Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. LE BLOND to refer the joint resolution and pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon which Mr. ELDRIDGE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I will first express my satisfaction to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that the sun was allowed to go down on our deliberations upon this most important resolution. I confess that I am one of the gentlemen to whom the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] referred as being opposed to the amendment of the Constitution. I believe that this is not the time for its amendment, and I believe, further, that there are other States than those represented upon this floor which are entitled to deliberate with us on that question; and to that point I shall mainly address the remarks which I have to make at this time.

Mr. Speaker, the war, we have been officially informed, is over. That greatest conflict of modern days that hung the heavens in black and moved the world is ended. The graves of the slain are growing green, and the hearts that were torn with unutterable anguish are beginning to heal. It is time that the fearful and malignant passions which were aroused in the breasts of the opposing parties should be permitted to die; that time, which assuages our griefs and mitigates our sorrows, should modify our resentments and cool our anger. It is time, indeed, when a calm retrospect of all those bloody and sorrowful days of war and sanguinary strife should be taken. The warrior should be succeeded by the statesman. It should be ascertained speedily and accurately where we are, what we have accomplished, whither we have been drifting, and whether the ship of state is now under the control and guided by the chart and compass, the Constitution.

There is, perhaps, no better way to ascertain the present relations of the revolted States to the Union than by considering the purpose and object of the war.

It was a fearful conflict and prosecuted on the most gigantic scale possible on both sides. The insurgents struggled against fearful odds, and almost to complete exhaustion. They sacrificed everything and exhausted every resource. A sublimer will, a more determined purpose never possessed and inspired a great people than that which filled the hearts and minds of the adherents of the Union. With greater resources and greater numbers, as one vast army went down another and another came rushing like the mighty winds to the field of battle. Every soldier that fell inspired a score to fill his place and avenge his death. Every man, every life, and every dollar of the Republic were pledged and ready upon call to secure success, to insure victory. And few were found to say it was too much.

And what was it all for—what was the purpose, what was the object of all this expenditure of treasure and life? Was there no great and good purpose commensurate with the sacrifices the nation was making and willing to make? Was it a mere feud, some great hatred of the sections, for which, in blind frenzy, in furious passion, in mere madness they were seeking each other's lives and destruction? Was it this that moved a great and good people to such a mighty conflict with each other?

Sir, the purpose and object of the war were so clearly laid down, so definitely understood, its necessity so apparent and the result to be obtained so meritorious and patriotic, that during the period of its prosecution it was, in the judgment of the majority of this House, disloyalty amounting almost to treason to question or doubt the propriety even of the manner in which it was conducted. Many wrongs, many outrages upon the rights and liberties of the people were, indeed, perpetrated. There were arrests and imprisonments without warrant, trials without jury; freedom of speech and the press was denied, and almost every violation of all the sacred rights of liberty and conscience. All these were submitted to and even justified, because they were only temporary expedients by which to accomplish the sacred purpose in the name of which they were perpetrated.

And, sir, what was the purpose, what was the cause for which the people, the citizens of the Republic, were called upon to suffer and forbear so much? Our country was rich, prosperous, great, powerful, and happy. Its commerce whitened every sea and its proud flag waved honored and respected in every port. The people had not become dissatisfied with republican institutions; they desired not to go back to monarchy or build up empire. Some of the citizens of some of the States had become dissatisfied with their place in the Union and determined upon secession, "peaceably if they could, and forcibly if they must." If those States or the people thereof did commence the war, what was it for, what did they seek to obtain? Was it for any other purpose than to break off their constitutional relations with the Union and with the other States, that they might realize secession as a fact? That was the avowed and well-understood purpose of all their warlike measures.

The adhering States joined issue with the secessionists upon that precise and only question. They denied the right, under the Constitution, for any State or the inhabitants thereof to secede. They held the Union to have been formed in perpetuity; that nothing but successful revolution could ever break or divide it. And to save the integrity of the Union, to hold the rebellious States to their constitutional obligations, to coerce them and the people to perform their duties and functions according to the Constitution in the Union, they accepted the wager of battle. In this connection I desire to call the attention of the House to the message of the late Executive, which has been so often referred to in debate on this subject; not because it was the opinion of Mr. Lincoln, but because it was in the nature of a proclamation to the nations of the world, to the loyal people of the country, and to the rebels in arms, of the terms of war and peace with the insurgent States, which is still binding upon the national authorities:

"Let there should be some uneasiness in the minds of candid men as to what is to be the course of the Government toward the southern States after the rebellion shall have been suppressed, the Executive deems it proper to say it will be his purpose then, as ever, to be guided by the Constitution and laws."

"He desires to preserve the Government that it may be administered for all as it was administered by the men who made it. Loyal citizens everywhere have a right to claim this of the Government, and the Government has no right to withhold or neglect it."

This declaration was made at one of the most important epochs of the war. It was put forth to relieve the "minds of candid men" as to the course of the Government when rebellion should be suppressed. It was uttered to loyal citizens everywhere, in the insurgent States as well as the adhering.

It was the platform on which the war on behalf of the Republic was to be carried on, and the basis of peace and reunion when victory should be obtained. It was not alone the declaration of the head of a great party, it was the head of the nation speaking by the authority and in the name of the Government. It was spoken to the loyal and the disloyal. It was intended to weaken the rebel cause and encourage the supporters of the Government. It is a full solution of all our troubles and difficulties. It is as binding now the war is over as it was before.

It is the policy of the present Executive, as I understand it, to carry out and keep the plighted faith of the Government. And it is this which brings upon his head the maledictions of the radicals.

The Executive is no more committed to this doctrine than Congress and the people of the northern States. The late President declared over and over again "that his paramount object was to restore the Union." In view of all this he was reelected, and in March, 1863, he was indorsed and indemnified for all he had done, by act of Congress.

In July, 1861, the House of Representatives almost unanimously declared the war not to be a war for "conquest or subjugation," but to "maintain the supremacy of the Constitution," to "preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired." This was the declaration of war on the part of Congress. These declarations by Congress and the Executive were intended as the war platform of the country. It was the war platform of the miscalled Union party; the one upon which it gained its present power and strength—the strength and power by which it is able to resist and prevent the complete reunion of all the States, and deprive them of their representation in this Congress.

Sir, I maintain these declarations are in the nature of promises made to an enemy in the course of war; made for the purpose of drawing off his adherents, of weakening his forces. The insurgents had a right to rely upon them till the terms were withdrawn. Many did rely upon them. There was no time specified within which they should avail themselves of them. They remained open till peace was declared. The insurgents laid down their arms upon those terms as clearly as though they had been in the stipulation. There was no separate national existence admitted in the insurgents. On the contrary it was claimed and insisted, on the part of the Government, that there was not enough of the enemy to justify or authorize a treaty; no competent authority with which we could treat. They laid down their arms finally on demand and by force of the power of the Government, and submitted themselves to the jurisdiction and authority of the United States. The arbitrament of the sword was ended. From that moment, from the moment peace was declared, they were subjects of the United States Government, entitled to the protection and liable to answer to the offended majesty of the Constitution and laws.

Sir, these pledges to the world, to the country, and especially to the loyal men of the insurgent States, made when they were struggling with and overborne by a force which neither they nor the whole power of the Government could resist, ought to settle at once and forever the whole question of reconstruction—ought to permit the people of these States to resume their proper relations to and duties in the Union without further hinderance or delay.

We all remember how you of the majority cried out against the disloyalty of the Democratic Chicago convention during the last presidential campaign, and also the furious denunciation in this House, only the other day, by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] of the members of that convention as "conspirators," because they resolved "that after four years the war had failed to restore the Union." Bitter and terrible as your denunciations were, with how much more force do they apply to you who insist that the Union is not to-day restored! It is not only after more than four years of war, but after peace conquered, after full submission of the insurgents, you declare that war has failed to restore the Union. Nay, more, you stand with the sword of party power over the very portals of the Union to resist the resumption by the States of their constitutional duties and functions. You resolve, not only that it has not, but that while you have the power it shall not, be restored. Nay, more even than that, you insist that the war has killed the States, and of necessity destroyed the Union. When before was there ever exhibited such faithlessness, such perfidy, such utter disregard of all promises and principles?

It would seem that any party of men not absolutely debauched or dead to all sense of honor, in view of the record you have made, the pledges you have given, the hopes you have inspired, the sacrifices you have demanded, the lives that have been offered up, and the vast debt you have incurred, all in the name of the Union, that you would, without further technical higgling over the rights of the conqueror, the doctrines of estoppel and forfeiture, or the result of conceding belligerent rights, hasten to fulfill your plighted faith and the just expectations of a vast majority of the American people, by realizing at once and forever the promised fruits of victory in a restored and regenerated Union. Nothing short of this is a fulfillment of your pledges, nothing less would justify the war you have prosecuted, nothing else would be justice to the conquered or worthy of the conqueror. On the sole ground of good faith, if there were no other, I demand the constitutional union of all the States.

But in the absence of all pledges given by the Government in the course of the war, claiming nothing on the ground of its plighted faith, I insist the insurgent States are not out of the Union, and that they can never get out except by successful revolution, and none but secessionists ever dreamed that they could. It is the greed of illegal gain, the lust of power, the love of dominion, the maddening taste of blood, and the desire of vengeance upon a fallen foe that has made these new converts to this doctrine. It finds its impulse and its logic in infuriated passion, in malignant hate, and would debase reason and justice to justify the indulgence.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who I believe never made any virtue of love for the Union, and who during the war declared, "This Union never shall, with my consent, be restored under the Constitution as it is," sets himself to work with his great learning and vast research to find among the musty records of the past some plausible ground to prevent its restoration now the war is over.

He gravely tells us there has been a war between the so-called confederate and the United States. I did not suppose it was denied or doubted that the state of things existing between them was a state of war. There need be no reference to authority to convince the people of this country or any other that we have had war. The absence of some loved one from almost every house and hamlet in all the land who has fallen on the deadly field of battle, the mutilated veterans whom we meet in our daily walk, and the mourners that go about the streets, are too solemn reminders to require argument or authority to satisfy us that there has been a most sickening and heart-rending war. But the honorable gentleman insists that this war has had the effect to sever and divide the Union and place the insurgent States in the power of the Government as conquered provinces. To sustain his position he cites the following from Vattel:

"A civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge. These two parties must therefore be considered as thenceforward constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies; two distinct societies. They stand, therefore, in precisely the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest, and being unable to come to an agreement, have recourse to arms."

In my judgment, Vattel lays down no such doctrine as the gentleman claims. The passage cited proves no such thing. It has reference only to the time during which the war continues. A civil war breaks or at least suspends the force and effect of the bands. The two parties must therefore be considered, "at least for a time, as constituting two separate bodies." It must certainly depend upon the result of the war as to whether it breaks or only suspends the bands and makes the two parties independent societies when the war is over. If the revolutionary party, whose purpose it is to divide and break the union, were to be successful, then it would be permanent. If it fails, if the Government which is prosecuting the war for the purpose of preserving the union, for the purpose of preserving the bands, is successful, then clearly the war has only suspended the bands.

The chapter from which this passage is taken, chapter eighteen, commences in this language:

"It is a question very much debated whether the sovereign is to observe the common laws of war toward rebellious subjects who have openly taken up arms against him. A flatterer or a cruel ruler immediately says that the laws are not made for rebels, for whom no punishment is too severe. Let us proceed more mildly, and that we may clearly see how the sovereign is to behave toward revolted subjects, we should first remember that all sovereign rights are derived from those of civil society, from the trust reposed in him, and the obligation he is under of watching over the welfare of the nation, procuring its greatest happiness, of maintaining order, justice, and peace therein."

Again:

"But what conduct shall the sovereign observe toward the insurgents? I answer, in general, that which shall at the same time be most conscientious to justice and most salutary to the State."

This is the mode of conducting civil war according to the laws of war. But what should be the conduct of the sovereign when peace has been obtained? Let Vattel answer:

"A sovereign having conquered the opposite party and reduced it to submit and sue for peace, he may except from amnesty the authors of the troubles, the heads of the party; may bring them to legal trial, and on conviction punish them."

"When amnesty has been published and accepted, whatever has passed must be buried in oblivion. No one is to be called to account for what he has done relative to the disturbances; and in general a prince who makes any conscience of his word is faithful to keep what he has promised to rebels themselves—I mean to those of his subjects who have revolted without reason or necessity."

Is there anything in all this to justify the conclusion of those who contend that the Government, by the laws of war and of nations, now holds the insurgent States as conquered provinces; that it is authorized to treat all the people of those States as conquered subjects, as public enemies, or as aliens? If so, no civil war can ever exist without dividing the body-politic. The very object of political association would be destroyed. Vattel says at page 62:

"The preservation of a nation consists in the duration of the political association of which it is founded."

"In the act of association, in virtue of which a multitude of men form together a State or nation, each individual has entered into engagement with all, and all have entered into engagements with each, to procure the common welfare. It is manifest that these reciprocal engagements can no otherwise be fulfilled than by maintaining the political association. The entire nation is obliged to maintain the association." * * * "If the nation is obliged to preserve itself, it is not less obliged carefully to preserve all its members. The nation owes this to itself; since the loss of even one of its members weakens it, and is injurious to its own preservation."

It owes this also to the—

"Members in particular, in consequence of the very act of association; for those who compose a nation are united for their defense and common advantage; and none can justly be deprived of this union."

This is the nature and object of national political association, according to Vattel. The doctrine that the national authority, in the very act of asserting itself, must, if opposed, destroy the association and change the body-politic is the most miserable subterfuge, the most contemptible excuse, for the usurpation of ungranted powers that was ever devised. It is the doctrine of the "flatterer or the cruel ruler who says that the laws are not made for rebels, for whom no punishment is too severe." It is the doctrine of fanatical revolution crying union but working in the interest of empire. Civil war did exist, but so far as the Government of the United States is concerned it was not a war against the States or the people. It was a war against the insurrection, against rebels in arms, against those resisting the laws and the Constitution, those who by the war sought to subvert and overthrow the Government, who undertook by rebellion to sustain and enforce the unfounded and illegal claim to secede. In such a war, when peace is obtained, it would be monstrous injustice to treat all the people of the insurrectionary States alike as enemies. It is the duty of the prince or sovereign authorities to discriminate between the innocent and the guilty, and to restore all those who have remained faithful, or who have been overborne for the time being and forced from their allegiance, to all their former rights. All such persons were entitled to the protection of the Government at all hazards. It is the very object for which Governments are instituted, to protect the weak against the strong, to enforce the laws and preserve the State. What other justification is there for war of the nation with its own people, its own subjects? What other war is there justified by the Constitution?

There was never any right or constitutional power to make any other war. It was never pretended that it was a war of conquest or dominion, but to assert and maintain the mild and peaceful provisions of the Constitution, the Government of the United States. Such a war can never place this Government in the attitude of conqueror, or the people of the State in the attitude of conquered subjects, or make the State a conquered province. The jurisdiction of the United States is only that prescribed by the Constitution. Whatever pretense there may be of implied and enlarged war powers, these powers can only be claimed or exercised as incident to the war. By what warrant or provision in the Constitution can the supreme Government make conquest of one of its own States, or exercise dominion over its own citizens except in subordination to the Constitution? The very idea would be preposterous. Its jurisdiction is the same and only the same after the insurrection is suppressed that it was before it was begun. Before the war the United States had the right to exercise the jurisdiction, sovereignty, and power over the States and the people of the States, prescribed, defined, and limited by the Constitution. The war ended, it could do no more than exercise the same jurisdiction over them as States and people of States forming constituent parts of the Union.

It would be monstrous if the United States, endowed with sovereign powers, prescribed, defined, and limited by a Constitution emanating from the people through the States, could exert itself to destroy one of the constituent elements of its own life, the source of its own power, and without which even the Union itself is dead. The Government has not increased the sphere of its sovereignty nor lost any of its sovereign powers by the war. The crime of the rebels was that they refused to perform their duties and functions in the Union. The Government demanded that they should. It made no other demand during the insurrection. It had no power to make any other demand. It required this by virtue of its supreme authority, derived from the Constitution, and in the interest not alone of the people of the insurgent States, but in the right and interest of every loyal citizen of the United States. The United States cannot force a State to abdicate its functions or rights as a State in the Union, nor can it accept the abdication from a State. It has power under the Constitution to admit a State to the Union, but no power to permit it to retire or depart from the Union.

But gentlemen say the rebel States are out of the Union, and they are estopped from denying it by their ordinances of secession; the rebels have forfeited all their constitutional rights and the right of being States in the Union; that they have committed suicide and are absolutely dead.

Estoppels were never much favored in the law, and were applied only in clear cases. But in any case, in order to be binding they must be mutual, both parties must be estopped, and they must be plead or insisted upon by those who would have advantage of them. But the claim comes too late with us; we never relied upon it, and always denied the validity of these ordinances. That was always the issue of the war.

But the Government is estopped in a thousand ways from denying that those States are and at all times have been States in this Union.

In the first place, the United States Government has no legal or constitutional right or power to do any act or consent to anything being done that could amount to a deprivation or relinquishment of its control or sovereignty over them as States in the Union.

Nor has the Government done or consented to anything of the kind. On the contrary, it has at all times during the continuance of the insurrection by the exercise of the highest sovereignty asserted its continuing relationship under the Constitution. It has demanded at the point of a million bayonets, and by all the terrible enginery of war, that the insurgents should lay down their arms, cease their rebellion, and return to their duties. It has by the most solemn acts of every department of the Government continuously recognized them in their relations as States. It has provided by act of Congress for their representation and the number thereof in this body. Based upon that representation, and in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution and laws, it has apportioned to each of the eleven States, by name, its proper share of twenty millions of direct tax, and enforced its payment by sale of lands. It has proclaimed peace, and that the insurrection is put down. It has aided and encouraged by all the powers it possessed the resumption by the people of those States of their abandoned duties and obligations in the States. It has invited them to take part in the amendment of the Constitution itself, and proclaimed their action upon it, and that it had actually, through their aid, been done. Nay, more; the people of the United States themselves, exercising the most solemn and exalted right of freemen, have chosen a citizen of one of those States the Chief Executive of this nation, who, if they are not States in the Union, is an alien and usurper.

Sir, the people of those States have laid down their weapons of warfare, accepted and acted upon the often proffered terms of peace and reunion, and now plead and insist on the record as an estoppel. And is it not full, complete, and effectual? Is it not mutual and valid? Would it not be a gross fraud to deny them? Are not their representatives entitled to be admitted?

"But they are rebels, and rebels have no rights but the right to be hung," cries the bloody-mouthed Jacobin, who would take advantage of these times to change and revolutionize the Republic; they have forfeited by their rebellion even the States in which they happened to reside; they have forfeited all constitutional rights. Have gentlemen considered the result of this doctrine?

Forfeiture of what, and to whom? Have they forfeited or can they forfeit their right and duty to obey the Constitution and laws? Have they forfeited or can they forfeit their obligation to pay their proportion of the direct taxes that have been or may be apportioned upon them as States in the Union? Have they forfeited or can they forfeit their duty to assist in the defense of the Republic in case of foreign invasion? The highest interest of the nation is that all the States of the Union and every citizen should peaceably and promptly discharge all their duties and obligations to and in the Union. The State of Wisconsin has as much interest in South Carolina remaining in the Union as she has in Massachusetts. Every citizen, every lover of the Republic, has the same interest in preserving to the Union one State as another. Every citizen of the United States has the right to have the Union preserved intact. The Union of the Constitution is the rich heritage which we have received from our fathers; we have no right to destroy or divide it, nor permit it to be destroyed or divided. The rebels can never forfeit your and my rights which, as citizens of the United States, we have in every State, and in the preservation of every State in the Union.

But to whom has the forfeiture been made? It cannot be to the United States, because the United States had all the jurisdiction and sovereignty it could constitutionally exercise over the State before the war. The Constitution, as I have before said, limited, defined, and prescribed the extent of dominion and authority and power of the United States with reference to the revolted States. It is the same precisely now the war is ended, and that is to require the States to perform their constitutional obligations, their proper duties and functions in the Union as States. When, where, and how did they make the forfeiture? Was it by violating the Constitution that they forfeited all rights under it? I deny, sir, that the rebels have no rights under that instrument. Their crime was the consequence of their violation of it; and the measure of their guilt is, now the war is over, to be determined by it. They have incurred the penalty which attaches to the violation of the Constitution, and not the vengeance of infuriated passion. If brought to trial they are entitled to all of its provisions; and if we should violate it in their trial or punishment, our guilt would be commensurate with theirs. Those who claim that the rebellious States are out of the Union by forfeiture fall little, if any, short of asserting that the Government is defeated; that it has sacrificed the blood of its citizens in vain; that the rebels have, in the hour and moment of our triumph, snatched the victory from us, accomplishing by their crime what they failed to do by the prowess of arms. But I assert, without fear of contradiction, that no one can forfeit what is not his own. The insurgent States cannot forfeit what belongs to all the States. Nor can rebels forfeit what is the right of every loyal citizen of the United States, the right to the Union of the Constitution, composed of every State ever belonging to it, free, equal, sovereign, and independent in their proper and legitimate spheres. Let it be remembered that the rebels are not the only persons having rights and interest in the insurgent States. All and each of the States of the Union have an interest; all and each of the citizens of the United States have an interest in the preservation and perpetuation of the Union of the Constitution; and all of the States, and every citizen of every State, is bound by the highest obligations of honor, interest, and constitutional duty to aid in its preservation to the extent of all he has of life and property.

The same course of reasoning answers fully those who claim that the insurgent States are dead and that they cannot be States of the Union till the "Government breathes into them again the breath of life." It would seem as though it were enough to add in reply that the power that can confer life can preserve life. If the Government can breathe life into the dead carcass of a State it could prevent the departure of life from it. It could have kept the breath of life in it. I for one have no faith in the resurrection by one who, struggling through long years, had not the power to preserve the original life. I will never consent to the death of one of the States of this Union in the vain hope that the party now in power and controlling the Government may breathe it again to life. Your breath may kill, it will not save; it is full of pestilence, disease, and death. You kill the body that you may destroy the soul of the Republic. But you ought to understand that the temple rests upon the pillars, and as you wrench them away the beauty, harmony, and proportions are not alone destroyed, but the whole edifice must ultimately fall. But if a State cannot die, then "once a State always a State." Why not? That is not State rights more than the rights of the Union. Who says, once the Union always the Union? Who says, once the Union shall always endure and the Republic be perpetual; that it shall never be destroyed? The States and the Union must coexist or the Union must die. The States might possibly exist without the Union, without the States the Union never! Beware how you trifle with the States! The union of the States is the Republic! The Republic is the States in fraternal union! The Union originally cost too much, and too much of life and treasure has been expended in its name and on its behalf, to surrender it on a mere technicality, or to barter it for the glittering empire you would build on its ruins. The fathers of the Republic were not mere partisans or fanatics, they were statesmen.

Sir, it is an easy thing to break up and to destroy this Union, if the gentlemen of the majority are right in all their modes of disposing of it. The fathers of the Republic little dreamed how frail a thing they were forming. There is scarcely a direction that rebels cannot drive their whole State through the Constitution out of the Union. The learned and able gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] in his answer, or perhaps I should be pardoned if I say his evasion of the pertinent question of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] "If they (the States) were out of the Union when did they become so?" says substantially, as I understand him, when the regular course of justice was interrupted by revolt, rebellion, or insurrection so that the courts of justice could not be kept open; "when, in fact, they became belligerents." This doctrine would prevent the Government from suppressing an insurrection without destroying the State in the Union. An insurrection that has attained proportions sufficient to entitle the combatants to belligerent rights has, by its own force, carried the State out of the Union. Let an insurrection arise for any cause in any State and the Government of the United States be called upon to suppress it, and by default or neglect it fails to do so till the "regular course of justice is interrupted so that the courts of justice cannot be kept open," and the revolt is then put down, the State must fall a conquered province at the feet of the Government, never again to appear as a State in the Union till breathed upon by the Republican majority of this House, now in control of the Government. Let war arise in a State, let an attempt be made at revolt successful enough to hold the State till, according to the laws of war and of nations, belligerent rights should be mutually conceded, and that star falls, like Lucifer, from the proud banner of the Republic, never again to shine in the galaxy of the Union till its people shall give guarantees to Massachusetts, till the institutions of the States shall be homogeneous with New England. If this doctrine be true, then indeed war has failed, must and will be always a failure, to restore the Union. It is indeed disunion, eternal disunion, and all efforts by war to preserve the Union worse than a delusion—it is a crime.

The ordinances of secession are void, the purpose of the rebels to secede has been subdued, their warriors have surrendered or fled the country in dismay; the triumphant banner of the Republic floats proudly over the State; the glad shouts of thanksgiving and praise ascend from the national heart that rebellion is crushed and the Union saved; when, lo! some Republican logician has discovered that the war was conducted upon principles of humanity and according to the laws of nations; the insurgent ports were blockaded; prisoners of war were exchanged; the nations of the earth claimed to be neutrals between the contending parties; belligerent rights were mutually conceded; all our hopes of restored union are blasted; the State is dead. Away with such absurdity! It is as fatal to the Union as the State. It places all the vast interests of the Republic at the mercy of a malignant few in a State, or at least of a bare majority strong enough to place the State in the control of an insurrection. To leave the State in the hands of the insurrection loses it to the Union. To make war to save it kills the State. In either event the State as such is lost to the Union.

This doctrine effectually nullifies the constitutional power of the Government to suppress insurrection or resist rebellion. It is no answer to say that the territorial State is preserved together with dominion over the inhabitants. This is no equivalent for the loss of the State as such. The Government of the Union cannot rest upon territorial dominion. This might support empire but not a republic of States. It may gratify those who seek to multiply and consolidate power in the central Government; but it is as fatal to the constitutional Union of the fathers of the Republic, and if possible more dangerous to liberty than the dogmas of secession. Let this work go on, let the central power • dismantle and absorb the government of State after State as the inhabitants shall make some feeble effort by insurrection to right the wrongs that will accumulate upon them, and we shall find quite too soon that the liberties of the people are gone. Civil liberty in this nation will never survive the States of the Union. The same power that demands the life of the States, will, when they have been swallowed up in its grasping and growing desire for dominion, demand the surrender of republican liberty. It sees the opportunity, and with an eye to its own aggrandizement now resists the readjustment of the dislocated members of the Union. Whatever the motive for this overthrow of our form of government, whatever the inducement for this dark and fatal leap, it is nothing short of revolution; when consummated, there will not be the semblance of the Republic of the Constitution remaining. In its place you will have reared an overshadowing, all-powerful, central despotism, which having no checks, and accumulating power as it rises, will dictate and control individual acts and individual liberty as it now does the action of the States.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] boldly declares his motives and purpose. He says:

"According to my judgment they ought never to be recognized as capable of acting in the Union, or being counted as valid States until the Constitution shall have been so amended as to secure perpetual ascendancy to the party of the Union."

"If they should grant the right of suffrage to persons of color, I think there would always be Union white men enough in the South, aided by the blacks, to divide the representation and thus continue the Republican ascendancy."

Here, then, is the motive and purpose of the majority of this House. The States are to be held in the grasp of despotic power; the Government is to be revolutionized to secure the ascendancy of the Republican party. Proclaim it to the country, let it go out through all the land, the Union, the Republic, must be deferred and sacrificed, if need be, to preserve the ascendancy of party.

Oh, if bitter and unrelenting party might relent, I would appeal to you of this House in the name of Washington, who warned against the fell spirit of party; I would appeal to you in the name of our common country, now anxiously awaiting fraternal reunion; I would appeal to you in the name of the brave dead whose bodies are scattered like the leaves of the forest on all your mountains and in all your valleys, and whose spirits are now looking down from the blue above, to tell you they died for country and not party; I would appeal to you in the name of those fathers and mothers who gave to the Republic, and not party, their first-born and best-loved sons; I would appeal to you in the name of the millions whose hearts bleed afresh whenever memory recalls the departed, and who find their only solace in the fact that those they mourn fell in the service of the Union, the whole Union, and not in the blind service of party, to relent. Give us the full fruition of our hopes, the reward of our sacrifices, the fruits of our victories, the fraternal Union of our fathers, the brotherhood of States. Parties are changing and evanescent; they go up and down on the waves of popular passion and prejudice; guard and strengthen them as you will they cannot live forever. The scepter of power will ere long fall from your hands. Another party as despotic and grinding may yet dictate, may yet determine the terms and conditions upon which your States shall exercise their rights and functions in the Union.

Party spirit knows no law; it refuses to reason; it has no attribute of justice, no sense of honor, no conscience, no toleration. The measure of its demands and exactions is the strength and power to enforce them. If you, to-day, can dictate the conditions upon which only the State of Tennessee may be permitted to perform her duties and exercise her rights in the Union, it may be only a question of time when some new elements, moved by popular caprice, may combine to dictate to New England. It is a fearful thing to trust the liberties of a great people to the capricious and ever-shifting power of party. I for one deny the right or power to dictate any terms or attach any conditions outside of the Constitution upon which any State may have its place in the Union. The only rightful conditions are, obedience to the Constitution and laws; and that obedience in itself consists in the full exercise of all its rights and the performance of all its constitutional obligations as a State in the Union. I can well understand how difficult a thing it is to look or act upon these great questions without prejudice or passion. The same writer on international law from whom I have already quoted says:

"The tumult of discord and the flame of civil war little agree with the proceedings of pure and exact justice. More quiet times are to be awaited for."

I would wait for more quiet times to amend the Constitution. The statesman and the legislator should never act from hatred or passion toward those affected by their acts. Bloody hands and malignant hearts should never invade the sanctuary of law or justice. The man who from preconceived opinions or prejudice would be disqualified to sit as a juror where the person toward whom he entertained such feelings was a party should look with distrust upon himself when he comes to legislate where his most sacred rights are to be affected.

Sir, the question has been repeatedly asked whether we would consent that those who had been engaged in the attempt to break up and destroy the Union should come back and enjoy the benefits of the Constitution they had endeavored to subvert. I answer, unhesitatingly, I would. There has never been a day or an hour since the first scene in the bloody drama at Sumter that my most ardent wish and prayer to God has not been that they might lay down their arms and come back; come back, not as conquered provinces, not to be held as conquered subjects, as a subjugated people, but as coequal, independent, sovereign States. To me the Union of our fathers is worth just as much as it was at the beginning of the war. Its restoration is just as necessary to the prosperity and happiness of this country now as then. And I go further: the crime of those who would prevent its restoration is just as black and damnable as that of those who made restoration necessary.

Sir, these are my conclusions, after the most candid and best consideration I have been able to give the subject. The war is over; its work of carnage and death is done; it has driven its plowshare down deep into our institutions; time can never remove its impress; its effect for good and for ill cannot be eradicated; the chains of bondage broken we would not again unite, the sundered ties of life we cannot; the passions, resentments, animosities, and hatreds aroused and engendered will slowly wear away; with it let the brotherhood revive. Our country has triumphed; its highest interest, its proudest glory, its richest blessing will only be realized in the full resumption by every State of its rights, its duties, and its functions in the Union of the Constitution. We want no Ireland, no Poland, no Hungary, with their oppressed and unhappy peoples cherishing their smothered wrath and plotting revolution. A restored Union is restored amity. Many have been wrong; all have suffered. As we hope to be forgiven, let us forgive.

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. Speaker, it is surprising with what indifference and haste amendments to the Constitution are proposed in this House. I understand some seventy propositions are already before the two Houses of Congress to amend the fundamental law of the land, involving in some instances an almost total change of our form of government. Bills and resolutions to change and amend the organic law are introduced and pressed, under the operation of the previous question, as lightly and inconsiderately as if this Congress were a State Legislature, and the Constitution a small railroad company asking for an amendment to its charter to build a small siding or make a turn-out on the road. This is truly an alarming state of things. Such legislation, at this time, patching the Constitution like an old coat, of which very soon the original fabric will be invisible on account of the poor patch-work on it, is not demanded, and will certainly not be sanctioned, by the great body of the American people.

The resolution now before the House is intended to affect the southern States principally, and we are asked to legislate for a people and country designated here by the leaders of the dominant party as aliens and foreign, as conquered territory under the law of nations. If this be true, which I most emphatically deny, then there can be no necessity for amendment. The northern States require no change in this regard. The States lately in rebellion are not and never were out of the Union, but we now pass laws affecting these States and the people thereof without granting them their constitutional right to be represented on this floor. And while I am in favor of admitting members legally elected, I wish to be understood that I allude to members elected according to forms and regulations prescribed by law—gentlemen who are capable and can qualify themselves to come here and take their seats equally with the rest of us.

There shall be no taxation without representation is a fundamental principle of American law. We tax the people of the South, subject them to the laws of the United States, and hold them to all the duties and responsibilities of citizens of the States in the Union, while at the same time we deny the right of representation in both Houses of Congress. It would much more comport with the dignity and sense of justice of the American Congress to let the legally elected members from the southern States be admitted and participate in the proceedings and debates, especially in matters of so great importance as a change in our organic law. Let us have a representation for our whole country. Wherever the American flag floats, from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico, wherever the star-spangled banner waves, that is our country. And let us legislate as Americans, as Representatives of our whole country, in a spirit of justice, liberality, and patriotism, and we will again have one country.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose, upon this occasion, to go into a general debate or discussion upon all the questions that are now before Congress; that is, as to the general condition of the country, and what method should be pursued in order to restore the Union. But, sir, in what little I have to say, I shall confine myself exclusively to the question before the House, and seek some other occasion to speak, if I speak at all, upon the general question.

A very important proposition was reported a few days since from the committee on reconstruction by the chairman of that committee. It contemplates the amendment of the Constitution of the United States on a subject second only in importance, in my estimation, to that embraced in the amendment which has been so recently made. At the time of its introduction the able chairman of that committee seemed to think that this body was prepared to pass upon it almost immediately. I have no doubt that he and the other members of that committee were satisfied—truly, sincerely, earnestly, and honestly satisfied—that that proposition was the best provision that could be framed for an amendment. To my mind, sir, objections arose at once; and I regret that a measure is to be pressed here that may raise the question of the construction of other portions of the Constitution, when, it seems to me, language can be found in which to couch the amendment so as not to infringe upon any of the barriers of the Constitution.

The amendment as reported would, at least impliedly, give to the States the power to discriminate as to those who shall be allowed the elective franchise. In some method of amending the Constitution I shall concur with the other members of this House; and while I may object to some features of the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I have no kind of doubt that one can be so framed as to command the votes of two thirds of the members of this House. But I do hope that any amendment which we may pass will be so framed that no objection can be raised that it trenches upon any other portions of the Constitution which are not intended to be affected.

Now, sir, I shall proceed to explain my own objection to this amendment. While the basis of representation contemplated by the body of this resolution is to me somewhat objectionable, yet, if we can agree upon nothing else, I shall assent to it and vote for it. To my mind, a better basis of representation would be the male citizens of the United States; for what we are seeking is a basis of representation, without regard to those who shall be allowed to vote in the States. I shall not, however, dwell long upon the question as between the two kinds of bases for representation, provided the odious feature which is contained in the proviso shall be removed. But, sir, I give notice that, if the proviso of this amendment be retained, if it cannot be changed so as to obviate this objection, I, with my convictions, must necessarily vote against this amendment.

The clause of the Constitution, as proposed to be amended, will read thus:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

Now, sir, in immediate connection with that, I will read that portion of the Constitution with which, in my judgment, this proviso directly conflicts, and which we may as well blot out if we pass this resolution with this proviso. In section four of article four of the Constitution I find this language:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

Now, sir, we are to consider these things as they will be practically applied. We must take the country as we find it, and try to adapt the Constitution to it. I grant that, if there is any State of the Union that has but one race, and that the white race, with no prospect of its ever having any other, and where a proviso of this character would have no effect whatever to exclude any one, this proviso might not be so objectionable so far as regards that State. But I do say that, by implication, it gives the power to any State to exclude a whole class on account of race or color. I believe that my friend here from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] to whom I intend to yield a portion of my time, will attempt to explain how it is that a Government can be republican in form, and yet exclude, if need be, one half of the population from the elective franchise.

The State of South Carolina, in 1860, had within its limits 291,383 white people and 402,406 slaves—more of the colored race than of the white race. I will give you another instance, an instance in which this proposed amendment of the Constitution would directly apply, and would give the State governments the power to exclude more than half of their population from the elective franchise. The State of Mississippi had 353,901 white population and 436,681 slave population. Why, sir, I can find right here on this table other instances where there were nearly one half of the population in 1860. There was not one of the slave States where a large proportion of the population was not black.

Mr. Speaker, by the amendment we have just adopted to the Constitution of the United States, there are now no slaves in any of the States of the Union; the slaves are all free. There is now no slavery within the limits of this Government, except—and God knows I wish we had that amendment before us at this time, for I believe a two-thirds vote would wipe out that exception—except for crime. There is no good reason under heaven why a man for crime should be sold into slavery. It is time when in this country there should be no servitude, not even for crime. We see to-day in the reorganized States of the South that for the most frivolous offenses they are selling the men who were once in slavery into slavery again.

Sir, a little time is worth while for us to deliberate on these great questions. We deliberated months on that amendment, and yet we did not cover the whole ground. Time is full of wisdom to us all. It contains more than men can contain. It shows that when we made that amendment we should have blotted out all kinds of slavery. A little time is worth while to deliberate on this amendment.

Now Mr. Speaker, when we are attempting to amend another portion of the Constitution in the first section of it, I say that we are making a direct attack on the Constitution. I say it; I do not know how many say it. I say it, without fear or favor, that that amendment will allow any State government in its organization to exclude one half of its population from the right of suffrage; and I say such State governments will not be republican in form. I know gentlemen will bring me authority one after another to settle the question.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to inquire of my friend from California, how many people can be deprived of political rights and the State government still be republican in form?

Mr. HIGBY. Does the gentleman want to evade my proposition? If he denies what I have said, let him do so. I have made a positive declaration. I do not want him to ask me some other question. He may answer as many of the questions as he pleases at another time, but let him answer my point right here.

Mr. DAWES. It occurred to me that the gentleman, having looked into this question, would be able to tell us at what particular point, that is, what proportion of the population a State may disfranchise and still have a republican form of government. I want to draw his attention to that point.

Mr. HIGBY. I do not believe that any State which excludes any class of citizens on account of race or color is republican in form.

Mr. DAWES. I agree entirely with the gentleman. Then I suppose he does not deny that the constitution of his own State is not republican in form.

Mr. HIGBY. It is not.

Mr. DAWES. I am glad to hear the gentleman say so; and I am glad that I interrupted him.

Mr. HIGBY. I do not believe there is a single State in the Union, except it may be one of the New England States, which is an exception to that general rule. I understand that the State of Illinois does not allow negroes to come into that State. I shall not shrink any responsibility in these times when we are settling great questions. We have had our lessons, and we had better improve them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. HIGBY. Yes, sir. I may be mistaken about Illinois.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman has said that Illinois did not allow negroes to emigrate into that State. It is a mistake. There was a provision ingrafted into the constitution of 1848 requiring the Legislature to pass laws to prevent the emigration of negroes into that State; but the Legislature has not passed such laws. And all the laws which were upon our statute-book making a distinction in regard to color have been wiped out. Negroes do now go there.

Mr. HIGBY. I am glad to hear the explanation.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will say, in support of the position of my friend from California, that the constitution of Oregon excludes negroes.

Mr. HIGBY. I am sorry to hear it. We all know what an effort was made to make Oregon a slave State.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the gentleman consider the States which have not a republican form of government as out of the Union?

Mr. HIGBY. Well, that does not belong to this question. [Laughter.] If the gentleman wants to go out, I have no objection. [Laughter.] It is a free country, and if a man does not like this Government, with all its defects, as well as he does some other, I have no doubt that he can have the privilege of leaving it. I do not mean that with reference to my friend from New York [Mr. DAVIS] in particular. He is a very pleasant gentleman, and I think very much of him. I speak generally.

Now, sir, I am aware that the practice has been very different. I am aware that almost from the establishment of the Government under the present Constitution, notwithstanding the construction that was given to it by those who framed it, we have practiced very differently under it, from the construction it would bear according to the principles of right and wrong. I have no doubt that they will find worlds of authority to support the position that by the practice which has prevailed for the last half century South Carolina has been recognized as a State with a republican form of government, and so has Mississippi, although in each of those States one half of the native-born population have been disfranchised, in violation of that very provision of the Constitution which I have just read.

And, sir, what has been the result of the violation of that principle? A terrible chastisement has been received by the North, while the South has been desolated by the scourge of war for the last five years. It is because the practice has been false to the principles contained in the Constitution of the United States; and I am not ready to-day, now that slavery has been abolished, to break down one single barrier of that instrument, but rather to strengthen it by provisions which establish justice.

I have stated my objection, and I am sincere and earnest in the declaration which I have made as to my views on this floor. I do not know that there are half a dozen in this House who will sustain me. I know, however, that I am on the side of liberty and right, and I have sworn to be on that side for the remainder of my days; and it is no matter what consequences may follow so long as a man has an approving conscience that will carry him through every emergency.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HIGBY. With pleasure for any question that is pertinent.

Mr. HILL. I have listened to the gentleman's statement, that in his opinion there is scarcely a republican form of government in any of the States of the Union. I simply desire to inquire whether he would favor us with his opinion as to what would be a republican form of government.

Mr. HIGBY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if the gentleman has lived to his time of life and has obtained a position in this House as the Representative of a large constituency without finding out what a republican form of government is.

Mr. HILL. I ask the gentleman—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield the floor?

Mr. HIGBY. I cannot, because it is not a pertinent question. I have stated that in two States in the Union there has been a palpable violation of the principles contained in the Constitution. I will ask the gentleman if he thinks that those States that have excluded and disfranchised more than half of their native population have a republican form of government?

Mr. HILL. The gentleman has propounded to me a question, and I will answer it by saying that in my opinion, when the framers of the Constitution placed in that instrument the declaration or the provision that the Government of the United States would guaranty to each State a republican form of government, they spoke with reference to such governments as then existed, and such as those same framers recognized for a long time afterward as republican governments. That is my answer.

Mr. HIGBY. Well, that is a very good answer. It is an answer from a standpoint seventy-five years ago. I speak from the standpoint of the present time.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will permit me to make one further statement in regard to our former colloquy I will be obliged to him. It is simply this: that the gentleman probably misunderstood me when I interrupted him before in supposing that I had no opinion on the question of what constituted a republican form of government. That was not my statement. I only asked the gentleman to give us the benefit of his opinion. That was what I wanted—not that I had no opinion.

Mr. HIGBY. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] asked me the question, and I answered it definitely. The gentleman may not have been listening when I made my answer.

Mr. HILL. I beg the gentleman's pardon if such is the fact, for I did not know it.

Mr. HIGBY. My answer was that no State is republican in form that excludes from the suffrage any portion of its citizens on account of race or color, I do not care how few the number. That was my answer. I do not know but that some of these States may have their constitutions republican in form, but I must confess that their practice under their constitutions has been very different from the precepts contained in them. I judge by their action and practice.

Sir, I do not dwell upon this for the purpose of advocating the amendment that has been introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] because, as I have before said, I am not so strenuous as to the form that shall be used or the basis adopted, provided that it shall get rid of this odious language that will give a construction to other portions of the Constitution.

The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] a few days ago, made a short and very apt speech upon this question, and confined himself very properly to his subject. I was pleased with the manner in which he handled the subject, and I was not aware that he was so wide in his figures until I made an examination afterward. I knew he was wide in his figures and away from the facts with reference to my own State, but I could not speak with reference to other States.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. W. J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 80) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon; and also a bill (S. No. 96) authorizing an increase in the clerical force in the Post Office Department; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION—AGAIN.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine gave figures showing the male population of the State of Vermont and of the State of California, placing them in comparison. And he also compared two other States, but I shall refer more particularly to the first two. I have no amendment to offer. I think there are enough already before the House. I simply present my views. If this amendment which is reported by the committee, together with those others which have been presented, shall be sent back to the committee, then that committee will understand something of the shape and form of an amendment that will meet with favor, not only from the propositions introduced here, but from the remarks which are made by members in this debate.

Now, sir, I think the better test of this question is the votes that are given from year to year. By taking the votes for two or three years, at different elections, we are more likely to get at a correct test of the male population that are entitled to the right of the elective franchise than we are from census returns. Believing that to be the most correct test, I shall give the figures of the votes in the two States, from an authentic statement before me.

In Vermont, in 1865, the whole vote for Governor was 38,456; in 1864 the whole vote for Governor was 43,548. The whole vote for President in 1864 was 55,740. These are the different votes recently given in that State. In 1860 the whole vote for President was 44,644.

Now, sir, I turn to the votes of California. In 1865, at the October judicial election, the whole vote given was 55,907; but that was not a test vote, because the judicial election never calls out a large vote, but it is given here first; and what is more, the soldiers' vote had not yet been received. In 1863 the whole vote was 109,162; in 1864 the whole vote was 105,975. I have given all the votes that are contained in this statement. I will state further, however, that at the gubernatorial election in 1861 there were over 119,000 votes cast for Governor. The voting population of the State of California has wasted within the last six years over 10,000.

Mr. MORRILL. I presume the gentleman from California desires to be accurate in his statements, and so far from the vote of Vermont being an accurate or fair test of the number of the male population in the State, it is very far from being so. The male citizens of the State over twenty-one years of age number something like eighty-seven thousand, while it is very seldom that half of them are brought up to the polls even on a contested election. In Vermont there is such a strong preponderance of the Union or Republican party that it is no object for that party to bring all its members to the polls.

Mr. HIGBY. I am very glad to have been interrupted by my friend from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] His statement makes it more favorable to my own State, for the very reason that there is no gubernatorial or presidential election in California but what the State is scoured, every nook and corner, every hill-side and gulch searched to find a voter and get him to the polls. And I venture the assertion that there are not two thousand voters in the State who are not brought to the polls at every gubernatorial or presidential election.

And I will state one other thing in this connection, and then I have done. It is this: it must be borne in mind that the great amount of foreign population that comes to this country, instead of stopping and settling in the older States, goes to the Territories and new States. And you will find, if a census should be so taken as to discriminate between the native born and the foreign born of your population, a far greater proportion is to be found in the western States than in the older or eastern States. And of that population, there is always a large proportion still foreigners who have not yet taken advantage of our naturalization laws to qualify them to be electors.

And another thing: I believe it is still held in some of the States, and constitutions are so framed, that those who are not citizens, either native born or naturalized foreign born, are allowed to vote. I have only to say in this connection, that while by the Constitution of the United States Congress are to make provisions by which foreign-born persons may become citizens, a State attempts to confer a right and a privilege upon an individual the highest that he can obtain under the laws of the United States by the process of naturalization; thus negating as it were that portion of the Constitution which requires Congress to make provisions to enable those foreign born to become citizens.

Now, my hope, my wish is that this joint resolution shall go back to the committee. I do not wish it disposed of here, to be voted down. I want, if it is possible, that it shall be so framed that it shall receive the full constitutional majority required, and be a proposition that shall operate with full force in all those States that now have a great population excluded from the rights of citizenship.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman proposes to send it back to the committee without instructions, I would ask him what we are to do. There are not quite as many views upon this floor as there are members; but the number lacks very little of it. And how are we to gather up all those views spread through all this discussion, and accommodate all, when each view would now probably receive from one to three votes in its favor?

Mr. HIGBY. I have only this to say; with my views of the Constitution, I never can vote for this proposition with this proviso in it in its present language. I say that it gives a power to the States to make governments that are not republican in form.

Mr. STEVENS. I say to my friend that if I thought that according to any portion, or verse, or chapter of Lindley Murray, by any fair construction of language, such an interpretation could be given as he gives, I would vote against it myself. But I do not believe there is anything in that objection.

Mr. HIGBY. "Provided, that whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation."

Mr. STEVENS. May I ask my friend one question? Does that take from or add to any powers which the States now have?

Mr. HIGBY. I beg pardon of the gentleman; he cannot get rid of this proposition in that way. I ask him distinctly if it does not acknowledge a power in a State to do such a thing.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir, it does acknowledge it, and it has always existed under the Constitution.

Mr. HIGBY. I do not acknowledge that it is in the Constitution as it now is.

Mr. STEVENS. Then we do not give it to them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. HIGBY. My time is limited, and I have promised to yield a portion of it to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire but a moment.

Mr. HIGBY. Very well; I will yield.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My suggestion is this: the Constitution now provides that Congress shall not until a certain year deny to any of the States the right to import slaves—that is the meaning of it. Now, the language of that provision of the Constitution did not give the right to the States to engage in piracy. Yet the States did understand that the Constitution authorized them to continue this piracy until the year named, and they did continue to import slaves and sell them. And can it not be implied from language not so clear, not so strong, that by this amendment a State is given the right to disfranchise the half of her people?

Mr. STEVENS. Nobody understood it so; everybody understood that without that prohibition they had the right, and with that prohibition it was restrained from a certain time; nothing more.

Mr. HIGBY. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WENTWORTH.) There are fifteen minutes left of the time to which the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] is entitled.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the honorable gentleman [Mr. HIGBY] for yielding me the floor, and I hope it will be the pleasure of the House to extend the time, as I shall not be able in the fifteen minutes allowed me by the gentleman's courtesy to present properly my views of the important question before us.

I stand here this day impressed with the belief that amendments to the Constitution of the United States are imperiously demanded by reason of the changed condition of the country. If the loyal people who have by arms saved the Republic shall not insure its safety by laws as well, then I fear in vain have the bravest and the noblest and the best of its sons gone down in its defense amid the tempest and the shock of battle. Unless this Congress, charged as it is, like the first Continental Congress, with the care of the liberties of all, shall perform the duty enjoined upon it, and send to the people the necessary constitutional provisions and guarantees for the future safety of the Republic, I apprehend that there are men now within these walls who may learn, when it is too late, that the ballot in the hand of the conspirator is more dangerous to the safety of the Republic than the bayonet.

If the amendment reported by the joint committee of the two Houses, or that proposed to be substituted by my honorable colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] be all that this House proposes to do in this regard, then I can only say for myself that I tremble for the future of my country. But is it all that this House proposes to do? Have gentlemen forgotten that but the other day this House, with singular unanimity—by all the votes, I believe, that it can command save six—sent to the Senate a proposed amendment to the Constitution, which, however informally expressed, is intended by the authority of the whole people to declare by the organic law that neither the United States nor any State of this Union shall ever assume or pay any debt or liability contracted or incurred in aid of the late rebellion, or which may hereafter be contracted or incurred in aid of any rebellion against the United States? Does it not suggest itself to the mind of every gentleman now within the hearing of my voice that the safety of the Republic requires that not simply that amendment shall pass into your Constitution, but that there should be added to it the provision that no State in this Union shall ever lay one cent of tax upon the property or head of any loyal man for the purpose of paying tribute and pension for life to those who rendered service or received wounds in the prosecution of this great, unmatched, and atrocious rebellion against your country? Does it not occur also to the considerate minds of gentlemen that it would be well to place the further limitation upon these several States, if they are to be restored to their equal position in the union of the States, as I trust they are to be at no distant day, that no State in this Union shall levy tribute upon its people for the purpose of indemnifying, in whole or in part, any rebel against losses or damages incurred either in the prosecution of the rebellion or inflicted on rebels in its suppression?

I ask gentlemen to consider that, as your Constitution stands to-day, there is no power, express or implied, in this Government to limit or restrain the general power of taxation in the States. And are gentlemen, admitting this fact, as it is now stated, to be true, to sit here and deliberate for one moment whether it is necessary to place such a limitation upon these States if they are to be restored, and especially if they are to be restored on the basis claimed by gentlemen on that side of the House who oppose this amendment—restored with the governing power in every one of the eleven rebel States in the hands of the very men who but yesterday waged war against the life of the Republic?

But, sir, even that amendment, desirable as it is, is yet not all that, in my mind, the safety of the Republic requires, and our duty and our oaths alike enjoin upon us to present to the people. Why, sir, I may be allowed to say here, without violating any rule of this House, that the joint committee of fifteen, representing both branches of Congress, do not themselves consider that they have wholly discharged their duty in this behalf to the country. It is not for me to say here what they have done, or to anticipate what they may do in the premises, further than to say that I doubt not they will discharge their whole duty. But I may say that the committee has under consideration another general amendment to the Constitution which looks to the grant of express power to the Congress of the United States to enforce in behalf of every citizen of every State and of every Territory in the Union the rights which were guaranteed to him from the beginning, but which guarantee has unhappily been disregarded by more than one State of this Union, defiantly disregarded, simply because of a want of power in Congress to enforce that guarantee. I do not doubt, sir, that if the committee shall succeed in presenting in fit and proper form this proposed amendment to the Constitution, it will receive the assent, I might almost say, of every gentleman in this House. Why should it not?

I understand very well, Mr. Speaker, that there are gentlemen for whom I have the profoundest respect, not only for their great attainments, but for their generous and patriotic motives, who contend, against all past constructions and all past experience, that the Congress of the United States has the power, implied necessarily, to enforce all the guarantees of the Constitution. In my judgment, unless some such general provision as that to which I have referred be adopted, it is in vain that you hope for future safety or future peace in the country; and I beg leave to say to gentlemen who reason in the manner I have indicated, and therefore seek to evade the discharge of this great duty incumbent upon us, that, notwithstanding the respect to which their opinions are entitled, the continued construction of every department of this Government, legislative, executive, and judicial, from that day on which Washington, for the first time, before God and his country, took the oath to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States," has conceded that no such power is vested in the Federal Government. Gentlemen will pardon me for further reminding them of the special express powers of the Constitution, and that the general express grant is that Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof. In what I have said upon the limitations of power, I do not express my own opinion, but the opinions of others and the uniform construction.

Sir, your Constitution declares that no person shall be deprived of life without due process of law; yet, in support of what I have just said on the necessity of an additional grant of power, allow me to remind the House of the fact that this highest right which pertains to man or citizen, life, has never yet been protected, and is not now protected, in any State of this Union by the statute law of the United States. And if to-morrow, sir, your President, because of his supposed fidelity, and I might add of his real fidelity to his duty, in so far as I understand his position, crossed the line of your exclusive jurisdiction in this District into the State of Maryland, into the county of Charles, and were to be there set upon by the whole body of the community and murdered, for no fault of his, but simply because of his supposed fidelity to his duty, your Government is powerless by law to avenge his death in any of your civil tribunals of justice. And this results from the accepted construction that this Government has not the power by law to enforce in the States this guarantee of life.

I repeat then, sir, in view of the facts stated, that it is well for the Representatives of the people to consider that in passing this amendment they take but one step toward the attainment of the object sought to be attained by all the several propositions proposed, to secure to each citizen and each State alike their equal rights in the Union.

Mr. Speaker, touching this and all other amendments to the Constitution, by giving them my support, I do not subject myself to the gratuitous imputation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] who spoke yesterday, of a want of reverence either for the Constitution or its illustrious founders. I beg leave, at all events, to say, with all possible respect for that gentleman, that I do not recognize the right of any man upon this floor, who was a representative of that party which denied the right to defend the Constitution of his country by arms against armed rebellion, to become my accuser.

In seeking to amend, not to mar, the Constitution of the United States, we ought to have regard to every express or implied limitation upon our power imposed by that great instrument. When gentlemen object to amending the Constitution, when they talk sneeringly about tinkering with the Constitution, they do not remember that it is one of the express provisions of that instrument that Congress shall have power to propose amendments to the Legislatures of the several States. Do gentlemen mean by the logic to which we have listened for the past five days on this subject of our right to amend, that we are not to add anything to the Constitution and that we are to take nothing from it? I prefer to follow, in this supreme hour of the nation's trial, the lead of a wiser and nobler spirit, who by common consent was called while he lived "the Father of his Country," and now that he is dead, is still revered as "the Father of his Country," and to be hailed I trust by the millions of the future who are to people this land of ours as "the Father of his Country." In his Farewell Address, his last official utterance, Washington used these significant words, which I repeat to-day for the consideration of gentlemen:

"The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government."

We propose, sir, simply to act in accordance with this suggestion of Washington. We propose, in presenting these amendments, to alter, in so far as the changed condition of the country requires, the fundamental law, in order to secure the safety of the Republic and furnish better guarantees in the future for the rights of each and all.

The SPEAKER. The hour has expired.

Mr. BROOMALL. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will be allowed to finish his remarks.

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall be obliged to the House; it is a favor which I have seldom asked.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am for the pending amendment to the Constitution of my country, and the other amendments to which I have already referred. I am for this and for the other essential amendments indicated, for the sake of the Union, and for the sake of the Constitution of the Union. Beyond that, if I know my own mind or my own heart, I have no feeling on this question. It towers above all party consideration; it touches the life of the Republic, and not the miserable inquiry whether this or that party shall be successful in the coming contest. It is for this House to decide whether amendments are necessary to the safety of the country and the protection of the people. I am for the proposed amendment from a sense of right—that absolute, eternal verity which underlies your Constitution. The right is the law of the Republic. So it was proclaimed in your imperishable Declaration by the words, all men are created equal; they are endowed by their Creator with the rights of life and liberty: to secure these rights Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; and by those other words, these States may do what free and independent States may of right (not of wrong but of right) do.

The Constitution recognizes this limitation upon the States that they may do, subject to the Constitution of the United States, what free States may of right do. That which is right and just limits every sovereignty, in law, whether it be obeyed or disobeyed. Every nationality is bound to respect the just and the right. This truth is recognized as distinctly in your Constitution as it is proclaimed in your Declaration. In the first article, second section of the Constitution of your country, it is provided that Representatives in Congress "shall be chosen every two years by the people of the several States," thus affirming that the law-making power can only exist by the consent of the governed, as the right of the people. Who are "the people" of the several States referred to in the Constitution? The term "the people" is borrowed literally from the Articles of Confederation, adopted, as the House knows, ten years before the Constitution, as articles of perpetual union between the several States then and since known as the United States. It is a term which had a definite and clearly understood meaning on the day that the Convention incorporated it into the Constitution of the United States. It meant generally the whole body of free citizens, and specially as the political power all free male citizens of full age in every State of the Union. I asked the attention of the House the other day to the fact, and I call their attention to it now, that in the Articles of Confederation it was expressly provided in words as follows:

"The free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States."

Can any one fail to perceive that the terms "the people of the several States," (article four,) borrowed literally from the Confederation and embodied in your Constitution, must mean the free citizens of each State? Who does not know that under the Confederation the majority of male free citizens of full age held the right to the elective franchise in every State then in the Union?

I appeal to every gentleman in this House to bear witness, that in every State of the original thirteen, on the day that the Convention embodied in the Constitution the words, "the people of the several States," the majority of free male citizens of full age, by the express terms of the State constitutions and their statute laws, held the political power of the several States. The employment of those terms in the Constitution of the United States was therefore but the clearest declaration that under the Constitution of the United States, as it had been under the Confederation, the right to exercise the elective franchise, to elect Representatives, was the right of the majority of free male citizens over twenty-one years of age, and that this right of the people should continue while the Constitution of the United States continued and remained unchanged.

The words "free persons" are also used in your Constitution; therefore by the words "free citizens" and "free persons," as used in your Constitution and in the Articles of Confederation, it was necessarily implied that there were citizens in the Republic not free, but bond. It was understood by the framers of the Constitution, and was expected by them and intended, that the day would come when the prefix "free" before "persons" in that instrument should cease to be operative and become meaningless.

Sir, the Constitution was framed with a view to that result, and to make it inevitable. It was hoped that the day of deliverance to the bond citizens of the Republic would come, not by violence, but by force of public opinion, operating on the minds and consciences of the people and speaking finally, either by the action of each State or through an amended Constitution, as the supreme law of the land.

If gentlemen doubt upon this subject, they will pardon me for asking their consideration to one or two provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

First, the ninth section of the first article provides that—

"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808."

This was simply a provision to the end that the Constitution, as to the foreign slave trade by any of the States then existing, should not take effect until 1808.

In section three, article four, it is provided, as follows:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union."

The attempt was made in the Convention to add to this provision for the admission of new States the words "on the same terms with the original States," thereby securing to every new State admitted before 1808 the reserved power, not right, but power, to unite with the States then existing in the wild and guilty traffic in slaves, both by land and sea.

Thank God, the great body of the Convention rejected with scorn the proposition. What did that rejection mean? They struck out on the 29th of August, 1787, the words, "upon the same terms with the original States." What did that mean? It meant that there should be no slave States admitted into this Union. It meant that no new States should be admitted under the Constitution armed with the power to practice that injustice in common with the then existing States for twenty years. The provision "on the same terms with the original States" was rejected; and what was the result? My own noble Commonwealth, Ohio, was admitted into the Union in 1802, six years before the Constitution could speak against the foreign slave trade carried on by the original States. Ohio was admitted as every man knows, only on the express condition that she should not then or forever after engage in either the domestic or foreign slave trade.

I think, sir, I have said enough and more than enough to justify the remark that it was intended by the framers of the Constitution that the day should come when the words "free person" in the Constitution would cease to be operative, for the simple reason that all would be free and none bond in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, touching the construction which I have put upon the words of the Constitution I beg to call the attention of the House to a few authorities to show that by the terms "the people of the several States" the Constitution did guaranty to the majority of free citizens in every State in this Union the right to control, by suffrage, the future power of their States and the future power of the Republic, but that by the guarantee the majority did not become empowered to take away the equal rights of the minority who were their peers. I read from Story, (3d Story, page 565:)

"It has always been well understood among jurists in this country that the citizens of each State constitute the body-politic of each community, called 'the people of the States'; and that the citizens of each State in the Union are suo jure citizens of the United States."

Rawle writes as follows:

"The citizens of each State constituted the citizens of the United States when the Constitution was adopted. The rights which appertain to them as citizens of those respective Commonwealths accompanied them in the formation of the great compound Commonwealth which ensued. They became citizens of the latter, without ceasing to be citizens of the former; and he who was subsequently born a citizen of a State became at the moment of his birth a citizen of the United States."—Rawle on the Constitution, p. 86.

Chancellor Kent says:

"If a slave born in the United States be manumitted, or otherwise lawfully discharged from bondage, or if a black man be born within the United States and born free, he becomes thenceforward a citizen."—2 Kent's Commentaries, fourth edition, p. 237, note.

I might as well say in this connection that the majority of the Supreme Court of the United States, even in the Dred Scott decision, were compelled to recognize the principle for which I contend this day. I read from that opinion:

"The words 'people of the United States' and 'citizens' are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing. They both describe the political body, who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the Government through their representatives."

"It is true, every person, and every class and description of persons, who were at the time of the adoption of this Constitution recognized as citizens in the several States, became also citizens of the new political body."—19 Howard, Supreme Court Reports, p. 404.

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of our country has been amended. The day anticipated by the framers of the Constitution has come, when there are none but free citizens in the Republic—the bond having become free. The day of the freedman's deliverance has come, not without suffering, not without sorrow, not without martyrdom, not without broken altars and broken hearts, not without storm and tempest, such as had not been since man was upon the earth; not without darkness, thick darkness that might be felt, and fire running along the ground. Though in terror, though in anguish, the day has come, and all are free in the Republic by the sovereign will of the whole people. Every slave the moment he is emancipated becomes a "free citizen," in the words of the Confederation, becomes a "free person," which embraces all citizens, in the words of our Constitution, becomes equal before the law with every other citizen of the United States.

What, then, sir, is the result? Simply this, that the Constitution must be amended! I agree, if the late rebel States would make no denial of right to the emancipated citizens no amendment would be needed. But they will make denial. The question is therefore directly before us, whether any of the States which shall be reorganized and admitted to exercise all the powers of a State in this Union to-day under the Constitution of our country, by which it is declared that all the citizens of the Republic are free, and that bond citizens are no longer to be found in any State or Territory in this Union, shall be permitted to have representation upon this floor, when by the fundamental law or by the statute law of such State the minority of the citizens of the State disfranchise the majority of its free male citizens of full age? That was not so when our Constitution was adopted. There was then no State in this Union wherein any considerable portion of the free citizens of the United States, being male persons over twenty-one years of age, were disfranchised. I but state a matter of fact within the knowledge of every gentleman here when I say that in at least five of the States of the Union there was no distinction made at all on account of color between free citizens of the United States in the exercise of the elective franchise. At that day no State would dare to assert any such power in a minority of the majority of free citizens. The question, then, that underlies this controversy is this, whether we will stand by the Constitution in its original intent and spirit, or like cravens abandon it. I assert it here to-day, without fear of contradiction, that the amendment pending before this House is an amendment conforming exactly to the spirit of the Constitution and according to the declared intent of its framers.

If there is any gentleman who is still in doubt upon this subject, I ask him to consider the fact to which I before referred, and which is indisputable, that no State was admitted into this Union at the time of the organization of the Government, which either directly or indirectly intimated that a majority of the free male citizens of the United States within its limits should be or lawfully could be disfranchised by the minority. The House cannot assent that any State shall do that under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the gentleman will excuse me. The House has kindly extended my time, and I desire to conclude my remarks in as brief time as may be. After I shall have done so, if the House is disposed, I will hear anything the gentleman may have to say.

I have endeavored to make the point clear that the issue now before this House is whether the Constitution shall be so amended as to secure to the free citizens of each State equal rights. The point raised upon the proposition reported by the committee is whether the declared intent of the Constitution of your fathers shall be enforced, or whether it shall be basely surrendered, by admitting that when all are free, a minority of the citizens of a State may disfranchise a majority of the male citizens of full age of the United States within such State. I deny their right to do so.

I might go further in this argument, and say, with the late Chancellor Kent, that whenever the majority of a State inserted the word "white" as a condition of the exercise of the elective franchise "it deserved consideration whether such exclusion would not be opposed to the Constitution of the United States." I believe that the free citizens of each State were guaranteed, and intended to be guaranteed by the terms of the Constitution, all—not some, "all"—the privileges of citizens of the United States in every State. That is the express provision of the Constitution.

But the question now presented is a very different one from the case just supposed, of the majority of free citizens restricting some of the rights of a minority. My friend from California [Mr. HIGBY] has informed us that there are one hundred thousand more free colored citizens of the United States in the State of Mississippi to-day than there are of white citizens; that there are one hundred thousand more free colored citizens of the United States in South Carolina than there are of white citizens, and then we are gravely told that we must not press this amendment because we are abandoning the Constitution and the intent of our fathers. That is a new discovery, one for which the Democracy ought to take out letters patent, that it was ever intended that a minority of free citizens should disfranchise the majority of free male citizens, of full age, in any State of the Union! For myself I will never consent to it.

Well, then, some gentlemen asks, why not go for a constitutional amendment which will declare, once for all, that no State in this Union shall make any distinction in the right of voting between male citizens of the United States, resident within its limits and over twenty-one years of age, save in the case of persons convicted of infamous crime after due trial? I will answer with all my heart that I am ready to go for that. But a majority of those with whom I am associated think that this is all that is needed at present, in connection with other propositions to be submitted by them. I am content with that. I want the American people by adopting such amendments to declare their purpose to stand by the foundation principle of their own institutions, the absolute equality of all citizens of the United States politically and civilly before their own laws. That is the issue involved in the amendment presented by the committee.

Gentlemen will notice that the first clause of the amendment proposed by the committee is in the express language of the Constitution of the United States, except the word "free." The word "free" in your Constitution has, I said before, become forever meaningless by your amendment to the Constitution declaring that hereafter a slave cannot be or breathe anywhere within the Republic. This joint resolution says:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

That is the exact language of the Constitution. Indians not taxed are excluded, for the reasons suggested by the venerable chairman of the committee [Mr. STEVENS] the other day, that they are tribal, are not part of the body-politic of the United States until they are subject to taxation.

It is objected to this resolution, among other things, that you retain the provision of the Constitution for the apportionment of direct taxes. I ask the attention of the House for a moment to the importance of that provision. I know that in the practice of the Government it has been found entirely useless in time of peace. In the present century there have been but three occasions when that grant of power in the Constitution has been exercised, and those three occasions were in time of war.

The effect of the amendment of my honorable colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] is to strike out the third clause of the second section of article one of the Constitution, which declares that direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to the ratio of representation; but his amendment leaves and does not strike out of the Constitution the provisions of the eighth and ninth sections of article one, the first of which is that the Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, &c.; and the second of which is that "no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken." How, then, will the Constitution stand? Why, sir, it seems to me that this fact is a fatal objection to the proposed amendment of my colleague. [Mr. SCHENCK.] If you are to dispose of the apportionment clause in the first article of the Constitution as to the apportionment of direct taxes among the States, you must go further and limit the power of Congress to tax as provided in the eighth section. Take away the power, as my colleague proposes, to apportion direct taxes among the States, and leave the power as my colleague proposes to impose a direct capitation tax, and you introduce into your Constitution an express power to make unequal and unjust laws, which was abhorred by the makers of your Constitution, and against which they intended to provide a perpetual safeguard in the clause for apportionment of all direct taxes among the States.

The effect of my colleague's substitute, if it be adopted, will be this: the apportionment clause of the Constitution as to direct taxes will be stricken out; the granting clause of the eighth and ninth sections, to lay direct taxes, even a capitation tax, will be retained. What will follow? The express power to enact unequal tax laws, such as are sometimes enacted across the waters under the iron rule of England, the imposition of taxes, so as directly to make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

Let me explain. You lay a direct tax of one dollar, or five dollars, if you please, per head upon every citizen of the United States, and you strike out the apportionment clause. The result is that the poor man in his hovel, surrounded by his ragged children, his only earthly treasure, is compelled to pay, according to that assessment, for every member of his household; while the single, childless man, with his $100,000 of annual income, pays not a dollar beyond the assessment on his own head. Under the provisions of the third clause of the second section of article one, which my colleague would strike out, that cannot be. Why? Because a capitation tax is a direct tax, and because the third clause, which my colleague proposes to strike out, requires that every direct tax shall be apportioned, not among the people, but among the States of the Union. The moment you so apportion it, it becomes a tax upon property, not upon persons. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if nothing else were said upon the subject, this objection to the proposed substitute of my colleague would of itself be fatal. With my present view of the matter, therefore, I cannot vote for that amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will my colleague yield to me one moment, that I may ask him a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHENCK. Do I understand my colleague to insist that in the ninth section of the first article there is no provision for any direct tax except a capitation tax?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; I do not take that position.

Mr. SCHENCK. The language of that section is:

"No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken."

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not take that ground, nor did I intimate any such position; but I insist that the terms of the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution affirm beyond all question that every capitation tax is a direct tax; and I will say further that the third clause of section second of the first article of the Constitution, which my colleague by his substitute proposes to strike out, requires and enjoins that every capitation as well as every other direct tax shall be apportioned among the States, and that the moment it is apportioned it ceases to be a tax upon the person and becomes a tax upon property. I insist further that, if you strike out the third clause and lay your capitation tax, and assess it without apportionment, not upon property, but upon the person, you thereby adopt a mode of assessment which the fathers of the Constitution wisely forbade, and which I trust the people of the United States will forever prohibit.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what more is there of this proposed amendment reported by the joint committee? I have stated that it stands in the very words of the Constitution, omitting the word "free." What objection, then, can there be on that side of the House to enacting it? "Oh! the proviso," say the gentlemen—"the proviso which declares that 'whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.' " I beg my friend from California, [Mr. HIGBY,] and my honorable colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] to consider that a grant of power by implication cannot be raised by a law which only imposes a penalty, and nothing but a penalty, for the non-performance of a duty or the violation of a right. Within the last hundred years, in no country where the common law obtains, I venture to say, has any implication of a grant of power ever been held to be raised by such a law, and especially an implied power, to do an act expressly prohibited by the same law. The guarantee of your Constitution, that the people shall elect their Representatives in the several States, cannot be set aside or impaired by inserting in your Constitution as a penalty for disregarding it the provision that the majority of a State that denies the equal rights of the minority shall suffer a loss of political power.

I have endeavored to show that the words of the Constitution, the people of "the States shall choose their Representatives," is an express guarantee that a majority of the free male citizens of the United States in every State of this Union, being of full age, shall have the political power subject to the equal right of suffrage in the minority of free male citizens of full age. There is a further guarantee in the Constitution, of a republican form of government to every State, which I take to mean that the majority of the free male citizens in every State shall have the political power. I submit to my friend that this proviso is nothing but a penalty for a violation on the part of the people of any State of the political right of franchise guaranteed by the Constitution to their free male fellow-citizens of full age.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. Most cheerfully.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask whether under the amendment we propose to adopt as a part of the Constitution of the United States, a State could not, by virtue of the proviso which it contains, have a right to disfranchise any class of citizens on account of race or color?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am sorry the gentleman did not notice what I said before he rose, for I think if he had he would not have made the inquiry. I say that the proviso is a penalty, and nothing but a penalty, inflicted on the State if its ruling class disregard and violate the guarantees of the Constitution of the political right of all the free people therein, being male citizens of the United States of full age, to participate in the choice of electors, by imposing on any part of one class special disabilities not imposed on the other class.

The guarantee in the first article of the second section of the Constitution rightly interpreted is, as I claim, this, that the majority of the male citizens of the United States of full age in each State shall forever exercise the political power of the State with this limitation, that they shall never by haste legislation impose disabilities upon one class of free male citizens to the denial or abridgment of equal rights. The further provision is that the United States shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government, which means that the majority of male citizens of full age in each State shall govern, not, however, in violation of the Constitution of the United States or of the rights of the minority.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask the gentleman to let me ask him a question.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly, although it destroys the order of my remarks.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask the gentleman whether the pending amendment reported from the committee does not, by forcible implication, if sanctioned by three fourths of the State Legislatures, admit that a majority may disfranchise a minority?

Mr. BINGHAM. As I have before stated, and I beg the gentleman's pardon for asking his attention to the fact, there has not been such a construction, in my opinion, of a law which imposes only a penalty, for centuries, if ever, in any country where the common law obtains. The construction insisted upon by the gentleman amounts to this, that a law which inflicts a penalty or works a forfeiture for doing an act, by implication authorizes the act to be done for doing which the penalty is inflicted. There cannot be such a construction of the proviso. It is a penalty. It says in terms that if any of the States of the United States shall disobey the Constitution; that if they shall make distinctions in violation of the second section of the first article of the Constitution, that as a penalty such State shall lose political power in this House, to the extent of the whole class or race against any part of whom the unjust discrimination has been made.

If, therefore, the State of South Carolina by a violation of the Constitution shall say that white citizens only shall vote, thereby excluding the majority of the free male citizens of the State because they are colored, the proviso is, that then South Carolina, instead of having six Representatives upon this floor as she otherwise would have, shall only have two. Is that not just, if the one third of the people of that State disfranchise two thirds of the free people of that State? It is according to the spirit of the Constitution? Is it not just as compared with the gallant State of Vermont, a State always faithful to the Constitution, with three hundred and twenty thousand white population, which sends three Representatives? South Carolina, according to the argument of gentlemen, may violate the Constitution, may violate every principle of republican government, may by the act of a minority deny all political rights to the majority, and yet for doing so the gentlemen who oppose this amendment say that she shall be entitled to six Representatives for her two hundred and eighty thousand returned rebel white citizens, and thereby count two to one over Vermont with twenty thousand more white population than South Carolina. To prevent so gross an injustice we propose the penalty that no State, by a denial of right to the majority on account of race or color, shall be allowed to represent such disfranchised majority of free male citizens. We say if a State does this thing such State shall be reduced in political power on this floor, but shall not be relieved from the payment of taxes on the whole number of free population.

You place upon your statute-book a law punishing the crime of murder with death. You do not thereby, by implication, say that anybody may, of right, commit murder. You but pass a penal law. You do not prohibit murder in the Constitution; you guaranty life in the Constitution. You do not prohibit the abuse of power by the majority in the Constitution in express terms, but you guaranty the equal right of all free male citizens of full age to elect Representatives; and by the proviso you inflict a penalty upon a State which denies or abridges that right on account of race or color. In doing that we are not to be told that we confer a power to override the express guarantees of the Constitution. We propose the penalty in aid of the guarantee, not in avoidance of it.

But, sir, if implied powers are to be inferred from the mere penalty proposed, then the objection on that ground applies with equal force to the substitute offered by my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK.] What is implied here? I say, by my argument, no such implication can be made. But I do say, as a logical sequence it results, if powers are to be implied because you impose as a penalty the forfeiture of political powers on a State that denies or abridges the rights of any portion of the people guaranteed by the Constitution, that the argument urged upon that ground against this proviso operates with equal force against the substitute offered by my colleague. What is that? This is the provision proposed by my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK.]:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union according to the number of male citizens over twenty-one years of age having the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Is not the effect of this the same as that of the proviso, differing in degree? It is a penalty. It is the diminution of political power in the State that limits suffrage among the citizens of the United States. The intent of my colleague's substitute is the same as that of the proviso in the resolution reported by the committee. It is to compel those States, upon the penalty of losing political power, to do equal and exact justice among the free citizens of the United States in the regulation of the elective franchise.

It results that the argument made against the proviso does apply as well to the proposed substitute of my colleague. Does not that substitute imply, according to the argument we have heard, that all citizens of the United States, being male persons over twenty-one years of age, in a State, may not be allowed to exercise the elective franchise? Did not my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] admit in his argument yesterday that this fact was implied? Undoubtedly. Does the substitute not imply further—if, as contended, a penalty for doing an act is an implied power and authority to do it—that the franchise may be conferred in the States upon aliens? Most undoubtedly. Well, is not that a violation of the Constitution? Was it not intended by the Constitution, as I argued in the beginning, that the political power of this country should be exercised in the several States of the Union only by citizens of the United States, natural born or duly naturalized? Undoubtedly that is the intent of your Constitution. The ballot is the sovereignty of the nation, and should only be in the hands of citizens. A few States of the Union, and but a few, have granted alien suffrage. My colleague, I am sure, is not its advocate. But let gentlemen, when they enter upon this mode of argument, raising implied powers from a restraining law, consider well whither their logic leads them. I assert again, without fear of contradiction from any man who deliberately examines the subject, that the argument urged against the proviso, that by implication it authorizes an act to be done which it punishes, that the argument lies as well against the substitute offered by my colleague. There is in my mind no doubt about it.

It seems to me, sir, that the joint resolution of the committee has this to recommend it in addition to what I have said over the proposed substitute, that it leaves to every State of this Union, according to the original intent and letter of the Constitution, its equal political power in the Union, provided the several States obey its requirements. That is precisely what it proposes. What is the result, if you substitute my colleague's amendment? You diminish necessarily the political power of the loyal States while you increase in the same ratio that of the rebel States upon their admission to representation in this House. Now, is it not enough for us to allow them to come in with equal political power upon precisely the same terms with the rest; or are we ready to strip the loyal States of the just political power under the Constitution which they hold to-day. I believe it endangers the future safety of the Republic to increase the political power of the eleven States that have been in rebellion against the Government, and diminish the political power of the loyal States. In my judgment, that would be the effect of my colleague's substitute. How? Why, simply this. Under the Constitution as it now is and as it always has been, the entire immigrant population of this country is included in the basis of representation. Every man knows that the great body of the immigrant population of America always has been and now is confined to the free loyal States. There is no considerable portion of it found anywhere within the limits of the eleven rebel States. By substituting the amendment of my colleague you strike from the basis of representation the entire immigrant population not naturalized, and therefore not yet capable of becoming voters, citizens of the United States over twenty-one years of age. I ask the House to consider whether that is wise.

It will be admitted, doubtless, that the framers of the Constitution inserted this provision to encourage immigration. They did so, not only by this provision of the organic law, which declared that the whole immigrant population should be numbered with the people and counted as part of them, but by the further provision that Congress should have power to pass a uniform naturalization law, and thereby provide that the alien population, by complying with the terms of the statute, should be clothed with the dignity of citizens of the United States and invested with the rights and powers of citizens.

There is no provision of the Constitution that is more essential to the future of the Republic than this. It is as true now as when the Constitution of the United States was adopted, that the want of the Republic is productive power. The wise statesmen who fashioned the Constitution invited to these shores the toiling millions of the Old World. They invited the workers and the builders whose honest toil clothes and shelters nations. They came from every civilized nationality, to be numbered among our people, and finally to become one with us as citizens of the Republic.

But, say gentlemen now, they shall not be numbered among our people, that we must depart from that policy which has hitherto given the Republic its strength, which has enabled it to achieve what has hitherto been seen only in the vision of the Seer, a nation born in a day, a nation that within the memory of living men has peopled this vast country of ours from the western base of the Alleghenies to the gates of the Pacific, and covered the continent with free Commonwealths. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the House will deliberate long before they substitute any such untried project for the older, safer way of the fathers of the Constitution.

One word more about this much-abused proviso. It offers an inducement to those States lately in rebellion, when they are admitted to their proper positions in the Union, if they would assert their political power, not only to make the franchise universal, but if the necessity exists to which my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] referred yesterday, to unbar the gates of knowledge and allow all the citizens of their States the means either of self-culture, or of culture through the beneficence and kindness of others. It is true that this amendment may not, as it cannot, compel the States to grant the means of mental instruction. This amendment will not accomplish all that we desire, but it will be a step taken toward the attainment of the end. I trust that before this Congress shall conclude its session amendments will be sent out to the people by which the Congress may upon their ratification be empowered to provide by law that hereafter no State shall make it a crime for a man, whether he be black or white, a citizen of the Republic, to learn the alphabet of his native tongue and his rights and duties.

Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored in the remarks which I have made to the House to show that the proposed amendment is a simple endeavor, by way of penalty, to enforce the existing grants and guarantees of the Constitution of my country. I trust that I have succeeded in making the House understand my own views, at least, of this important question. I think that no question more important than this has yet come before the House, and that none more important can come before the House for its consideration, unless it be the great question whether the Constitution shall be so amended as to give to Congress the power by statute law to enforce all its guarantees! I pray gentlemen to consider long before they reject this proviso. It may not be the best that the wisest head in this House can conceive of, but I ask gentlemen to consider that the rule of statesmanship is to take the best attainable essential good which is at our command. The reason why I support the proposed amendment is that I believe it essential and attainable. I do not dare to say that it could not be improved. I do dare to say that it is in aid of the existing grants and guarantees of the Constitution of my country, that it is simply a penalty to be inflicted upon the States for a specific disregard in the future of those wise and just and humane grants "to the people" to elect their Representatives and maintain a republican government in each State.

Mr. Speaker, the Republic is great; it is great in its domain, equal in extent to continental Europe, abounding in the productions of every zone, broad enough and fertile enough to furnish bread and homes to three hundred million freemen. The Republic is great in the intelligence, thrift, industry, energy, virtue, and valor of its unconquered and unconquerable children; and great in its matchless, wise, and beneficent Constitution. I pray the Congress of the United States to propose to the people all needful amendments to the Constitution, that by their sovereign act they may crown the Republic for all time with the greatness of justice.

Mr. BROOMALL. It is not my intention to make any extended remarks upon the subject now before the House, but rather to intimate an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time, should that time arrive, to the proposition introduced into this House by the joint committee on reconstruction. On the second day of the present session I had the honor to introduce one of the provisions which went to the committee that reported this joint resolution. It was the mode most in accordance with my predilections then, as it is now, of the two presented for our choice. I preferred then, as I prefer now, the proposition basing representation upon the actual voters. But I have so earnest a desire that the object which we all have in view shall be attained that I am willing to relinquish that predilection and go for an amended form of the proposition brought before this House by the joint committee, if I can obtain it. If that cannot be done, then I will go for the proposition itself. I can, therefore, with the better grace urge upon the members of this House the reconciling of the various views presented here, and our uniting upon something, because I am willing thus to waive my own preferences, and advocate a proposition based upon a different principle than that embraced in my own.

Of the two modes presented here for our consideration, the first is embraced in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and which is similar to the one I myself introduced, to base representation upon actual voters. Now, it appears to me that that would be a fair mode for basing representation. It is true it might possibly work injustice between the eastern and western States, in consequence of the greater preponderance of persons under full age and of females in the eastern States over the western States, and it is possible that that consideration alone ought to induce us to adopt the proposition of the committee or something like it. But I am by no means sure that the East is entitled to count its women and children in its basis of representation unless it gives them a voice in the Government, any more than the people of South Carolina ought to count their negroes without giving them a voice in the Government.

But I am not here now to advocate that provision. As I have said, I have concluded to support the principle of the joint resolution now before the House, in a modified form, if I can succeed in having it modified.

The resolution reported by the joint committee is open to one or two objections or more, some of which have been urged upon this floor with a great deal of force. I will reiterate them, and then state in what manner I propose to obviate those objections. The first objection is that so ably urged by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] that the people of the South, with their present animus, may reach the same result which we say they shall not accomplish, by excluding no races, no colors as such. For example, they may exclude all who do not own one thousand acres of land or its equivalent in other property. This would reduce the number of actual voters in South Carolina to a mere fraction of their population.

And yet the remedy proposed by the committee would not diminish their representation here. That is to my mind a serious objection.

Another objection has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] who first addressed the House on this subject yesterday. That is, that by the provision "that whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color," we seem to invite the people of the South to act upon our hint to continue to exclude people on account of race or color, and even go beyond that and exclude them on other grounds not embraced within the provisions of the resolution of the joint committee. Now, I am not willing, if I can avoid it, to give any vote upon this floor that will ever consent to the principle that States may disfranchise entire races of men. And yet if the resolution cannot be amended in that particular, I say again that my vote shall be cast in its favor.

Another objection pointed out by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is that the proposed amendment excludes all of a race until the last one of that race shall be enfranchised; that is to say, if the people of the South choose to impose an educational qualification upon the elective franchise among the negroes, by which all the negroes shall be permitted to vote but one tenth of them, the provision of the committee will exclude not only that one tenth, but the other nine tenths also. This might or might not be a serious objection, according to the disposition and mind of particular viewers of it, to punish or not punish these populations of the South. To my mind it is some objection; and yet I have no very great desire that they should avoid proper punishment for the crimes they have committed, or that they should not endure the full consequences of the state of things they have brought upon the country and themselves.

There is still another objection, and one not yet alluded to by any gentleman on this floor. It is this: the resolution provides that whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation. Now, there is a great deal of indefiniteness in both those terms, "race" and "color."

What is a race of men? Writers upon the subject of races differ very materially on this point. Some of them would make four or five races; others fifteen; and one whom I might name seems inclined not to limit the number short of a thousand. I myself am inclined to think that the Celtic race is a distinct one from ours. I think that any gentleman who has studied this subject attentively will at least have doubts whether or not the race that appears to have inhabited Europe in the early historic period, and has been partly dispossessed there by ours, is not a distinct race from ours.

Again, the word "color" is exceedingly indefinite. If we had a constitutional standard of color, that of sole leather, for example, by which to test the State laws upon this subject, there might be less danger in incorporating this provision in the Constitution. But the term "color" is nowhere defined in the Constitution or the law. We apply the term to persons who are of African descent, whether their color is whiter or darker than ours. Every one who is familiar with the ethnological condition of things here in the United States, and who sees the general mixing up of colors, particularly in the Democratic portion of the country—I allude to that portion south of Mason and Dixon's line—must say with me that the word "color" has no very distinct meaning when applied to the different peoples of the United States of America.

Now, these several objections are more or less formidable. If any one of them or all of them united should prevent two thirds of the members of this House from voting in favor of the measure, I am sure the committee would be content to modify it so as to avoid these objections. And I have in my hand an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the entire resolution, which I propose to offer upon the proper occasion. I will ask the Clerk to read my proposition, after which I will point out how it obviates the difficulties which I have suggested and which other gentlemen on this floor have so ably enforced.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States which may amend to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —. Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied by the constitution or laws of any State to any proportion of its male citizens over the age of twenty-one years, the same proportion of its population shall be excluded from its basis of representation.

Mr. BROOMALL. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that the change which I propose to make in the proposition now before the House is in the proviso. Instead of providing that—

Whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation,

I propose to provide that—

Whenever the elective franchise shall be denied by the constitution or laws of any State to any proportion of its male citizens over the age of twenty-one years, the same proportion of its population shall be excluded from its basis of representation.

It will be seen that this follows the idea of the committee, because it bases the representation upon population and not upon voters. It therefore does not work the injustice that has been feared between the extreme East and the extreme West, by reason of the peculiarities of their populations. It will be seen, too, that it avoids the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] which was that the people of the South, without excluding races or colors, may still arrive at the same end by affixing such qualifications to the elective franchise as will actually exclude not only all the negroes, but a very large proportion of the whites, because, according to my proposition, wherever the elective franchise is denied to any proportion—one tenth, one twentieth, or any other proportion—of the male citizens of any State over the age of twenty-one years, the like proportion of the entire population shall be excluded from the basis of representation. It therefore satisfies the requisitions of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Again, it obviates the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] that the proposition of the committee seemed to invite the people of the South to exclude and seemed to recognize their power to exclude entire races of men, because my proposition is not limited to the exclusion of men from the elective franchise by reason of race or color, but applies to their exclusion on any account whatever.

If Massachusetts should declare by law that she will not let her citizens who cannot read and write vote, and if by that there is the one hundredth part of her male population over the age of twenty-one denied the elective franchise, why, Massachusetts must submit to have that proportion of her population excluded from her basis of representation. And so with all the rest of the States.

It obviates the difficulty of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] who last addressed the House yesterday, that the measure reported by the committee excludes all of the race while possibly a part of the race may be allowed to vote, provided the exclusion of a part is on account of race or color. I have no objection to obviating that difficulty. It is but fair to obviate it. I think it is but fair, if the people of the South should return, and allow a purely republican form of government to be established among them, that they ought to be encouraged in the good work.

It also obviates the objection I have raised, the want of definiteness in the terms "race or color" in the resolution. It does not propose to limit its operation to those excluded on account of race or color.

I think if the measure be recommitted to the committee without instructions, notwithstanding my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] thinks the committee has not been enlightened by what has been said, that some plan may be hit upon which would secure two thirds of both Houses of Congress and three fourths of the Legislatures of the States.

I yield a part of my time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise not so much for the purpose of making an argument on the question before the House as to address myself to the House in respect to the spirit with which any proposition of this nature should be received on this floor. This Government was formed in the spirit of concession. Conflicting interests and conflicting opinions were compared and harmonized. The interests of different sections were considered, so far as they might be accommodated to each other, in order that this Government might live to extend and perpetuate the liberty of our citizens.

I believe that the spirit which actuated those who framed this Government should guide us to-day in our deliberations. That a great evil exists every one upon this floor must concede, for inequality of representation is injustice. I propose for myself, however, to ask nothing as a northern man which as a southern man I would not be willing to consent to for the sake of the Union. I believe there are objections to every proposition which has been presented. I do not know any proposition can be framed which will be free from objections; but, in view of the great object we desire to accomplish, I submit whether the members on all sides ought not to be willing to sacrifice something of personal opinion or local prejudice. I am willing to vote for that which will accomplish the most we can do in the deliberate judgment of this House, although it may not accomplish all that others and myself may desire to do.

We desire to restore the Union and to have an equality of representation. I want that the spirit of the Constitution may be preserved. I think the argument made by the gentleman from Ohio yesterday is conclusive that we ought by our legislation to hold out inducements to the people of the South to extend the elective franchise; but in accordance with the opinions I had the honor to express a few days ago in this House, I believe it would be wrong to compel the southern States to extend suffrage to men who are unqualified for its use. I only ask gentlemen on all sides to so look at this great national question as to remember that we are not only legislating for to-day, but for the future, and to be careful not to admit anything into the Constitution unworthy of the American people. I hope that by some provision we may remedy the great evil complained of. I hope that some plan may be devised which will not only commend itself to Representatives here, but to the entire people of the country, who must pass on all that we may do.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose there is a Union man upon this floor but desires that some amendment to the Constitution should be secured that shall avoid in future the patent injustice and glaring defect which now exists in the basis of representation in the southern States.

The fact that one South Carolinian, whose hands are red with the blood of fallen patriots, and whose skirts are reeking with the odors of Columbia and Andersonville, will have a voice as potential in these Halls as two and a half Vermont soldiers who have come back from the grandest battle-fields in history maimed and scarred in the contest with South Carolina traitors in their efforts to destroy this Government, cries aloud for remedy; and it depends upon Congress to inaugurate this remedy. And the country expects and demands from the large Union majority here some united action, and not to fritter away our strength in useless divisions and accomplish nothing.

We must be guided here by a spirit of compromise and harmony. No amendment can be presented entirely free from objection, and that may not bear unequally in some respects; but in the spirit of our fathers who framed the immortal instrument we are seeking to change, let us who have a common object at heart strive faithfully to agree, each section willing, if necessary, to yield a little for the general good.

I am free to say that to my mind there are serious objections to the amendment reported by the committee. Still, if nothing better can be agreed upon, I will support it upon the principle that it is better than no amendment at all. Numerous amendments have been proposed, many of which I deem so extraordinary as to be entirely out of the question. There are, however, a class of amendments that propose to base representation upon male suffrage simply. Let us examine for a moment the effect of this.

Those who vote will of course in all cases be the direct agents in selecting the representative; but what becomes of that large class of non-voting tax-payers that are found in every section? Are they in no manner to be represented? They certainly should be enumerated in making up the whole number of those entitled to a representative. If that is not done, then indeed we have reversed the progress of nearly a century, and the doctrine that our fathers fought against and overthrew in the revolutionary struggle is at last asserted in this country and made a part of the fundamental law of the land, namely, "taxation without representation."

The amendment reported by the committee adopts the right principle, and is good enough as far as it goes; but it can readily be seen that if the poor whites of the South or the blacks are excluded for any other ostensible reason than of "race or color," or if no reason is given for the exclusion in the law excluding them, the same difficulty exists as now, and the object sought to be obtained is defeated.

Do you suppose that those "whitewashed" traitors, with the infernal ingenuity which maintained the great rebellion against the grandest army and the most mighty power on earth for four long years, will not invent some scheme, if the amendment as it now stands prevails, to keep a downtrodden people whom they hate away from power and all means of elevation, and yet, true to their old habit of appropriating the use of these people without compensation, use their numbers as a basis of representation with which to get themselves into Congress? They will readily publish some ground of exclusion from suffrage other than of "race or color." They may require them to read and write, and yet keep alive the black code against disseminating knowledge among them. Indeed, they may require them to have a collegiate education, or something else equally absurd. Perhaps the fact of their undoubted loyalty to the Government will be a ground of exclusion.

It is no answer to say that the same ground of exclusion must be applied to whites as well as blacks. This does not necessarily follow. Suppose it were so, what consideration have the southern oligarchy ever shown for the "poor white trash"? With their contempt for labor, their known desire for a landed aristocracy and a privileged class, how ready would they be to exclude the masses by some property or other qualifications from power, to the end that they might grasp it all.

How, then, you ask, shall this be remedied? I answer, by simply also excluding from the basis of representation all those who are deprived of suffrage by reason of a property or tax qualification, or any other qualification not heretofore recognized as a qualification of suffrage in the State where the qualification is applied; so that no subterfuge could be adopted to defeat the purposes of the amendment, and so that a State would have the choice simply, as we desire it should, of enfranchising its people or not having them counted in the basis of representation; and thus the tax-payer of the State is not deprived by the Federal Constitution of representation absolutely, as in the other plan I have referred to; but the excepted classes are made dependent upon State action alone, the State having the power at any time to remove the disability that the Constitution imposes.

My amendment consists in adding to the joint resolution proposed by the committee these words:

And provided further, That all persons who are deprived of the elective franchise in any State by reason of a tax or property qualification, or by reason of any other qualification, which (other qualification) was not in force on the 1st day of January, 1866, in the State where the same is applied, shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

So that the joint resolution shall read as follows:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation: And provided further, That all persons who are deprived of the elective franchise in any State by reason of a tax or property qualification, or by reason of any other qualification which (other qualification) was not in force on the 1st day of January, 1866, in the State where the same is applied, shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

I ask the earnest consideration by the House of the amendment. It seems to me to meet all the difficulties that surround us, and I hope it will prevail.

It has been suggested that perhaps the loyal States will not pass the amendment. In my judgment the loyal States will pass any article that we shall propose to them for their adoption, and make it the fundamental law of the land. As for the disloyal States, those that stood in a hostile attitude against this Government and have exerted all their power for its destruction during the last four years, I have only to say that they have only the right which the criminal has who pleads before the judge for mercy. They will pass this amendment as they did the former.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. ECKLEY, who moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion and allow me ten minutes.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I yielded only to a motion to adjourn, so that I can go on in the morning. I have no objection to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. NICHOLSON] speaking now, provided it does not come out of my time, and I may go on to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] wishes to yield to the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. NICHOLSON,] and to take his hour to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not care when the gentleman from Kentucky takes his hour, but I hope the House will not adjourn yet. I would like to get through this debate in the course of the season, and unless we use our time we shall not get through this winter.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Delaware occupy the floor to-night?

Mr. NICHOLSON. I wish to do so.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the gentleman from Delaware will proceed, with that understanding.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I think I can safely say that I shall vote, not only against this amendment, but against any and all amendments to the Constitution that may be proposed at this time. The temper and disposition of the majority of this House is not such as should characterize statesmen seeking to alter and fix for future ages the organic law of the land; and if they should finally triumph in the mad schemes in which they are engaged, they will succeed in converting that heretofore sacred instrument, revered and obeyed till the present dominant party came into power, from a bond of union to a galling yoke of oppression—a thing to be loathed and despised.

The object sought by this amendment is to coerce the several States, and especially the southern States, into conferring upon the negro race the right of suffrage. It will not have that effect in the State I have the honor to represent, as her representation will be neither increased nor diminished by any action she may take upon this subject, being entitled, with other States, "to at least one Representative." But I protest against the attempt to invade and take away the reserved rights of the States, and that most essential one of determining who shall exercise, within their limits, the sovereign power of voting, the right to restrict its exercise as the interest and safety of their respective governments may require. This is but part of the favorite scheme of New England to take away, one by one, all the powers now exercised by the several States, and make this a consolidated Government, a centralized despotism.

They seem willing to relinquish their own rights as States for the greater satisfaction of wielding the whole power of the General Government. But I caution them to beware. They may bask now in the sunshine of conscious power, but "Westward the course of empire takes its way."

And though the negro is now the bond of union between the East and the West, yet the time may come when the power they have assisted to build up here, for the purposes of the present hour, may be turned against them. When the scepter shall fall from their grasp, and they find themselves defenseless before the power they have fostered, there will then be found those who will "laugh at their calamity and mock when their fear cometh."

But another serious objection against this amendment is the indirectness of the attack. It is presumed that the desire for as full a representation as can be obtained will compel the States having within their limits a large negro population to confer upon them the elective franchise. This might ultimately be the result, though you are compensated in the event of their refusal by an increase of power. Power is the object, in either event, which is aimed at by this miserable device. You hope that the blacks will be your allies should they become invested with political power. Be not too sure of this.

"The best laid schemes o' mice and men Gang aft a-gley."

The argument of gentlemen on the other side seems to proceed upon the assumption that the abolition of slavery has introduced a new feature into our political system. It is not so. The liberated slaves stand precisely upon the same footing with the free negroes of the North. Three fifths of them have always been represented; and if the other two fifths are now to be added, counting them as free persons, remember it is your own act. It is a result that you yourselves have achieved, and this small addition to their representation which the Constitution gives to the southern States is a poor compensation for the frightful wrongs that have been inflicted upon them.

But it is hard to discover from this amendment whether you do or do not desire the negroes of the South to be clothed with the elective franchise. It is therefore obnoxious to the charge of duplicity. If such be your real object, come out like men and avow it. Amend the Constitution in the right place, and do not seek thus indirectly to effect it, hoping to obtain some equivalent advantage if you fail in this.

Article one section two of the Constitution reads as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand; but each State shall have at least one Representative," &c.

Now, amend the latter clause of this section, and proclaim universal suffrage, negroes included, for members of this body, and there will be some consistency in your action; it will certainly have the merit of candor and boldness. For while the power to dictate to the several States what shall be the qualifications of electors for all offices, State as well as national, might be denied, the power to make this amendment might not be challenged; but the objection would be to the merits of such an amendment. I challenge the gentlemen on the other side to this issue. Let them declare that the negroes of the several States shall vote for national officers, and go to the country upon that question, and I am not fearful of the result. I judge the American people by the feelings of my own heart, and I firmly believe that they will never consent to share the Government of this country with a race of beings whom the Almighty himself has declared shall be the "servant of servants," and upon whom He has stamped the indelible mark of their inferiority. But should the majority persist in these attempts to revolutionize the Government, while they exclude from this Hall those who are to be affected by this action, and who have a right to be heard and to vote upon these measures, their conduct must at least be pronounced unmanly and ungenerous, and will prove the truth of what Prescott so forcibly expresses in closing his chapter on the Inquisition in his history of Ferdinand and Isabella. He says:

"Many a bloody page of history attests the fact that fanaticism, armed with power, is the sordest evil which can befall a nation."

DISCUSSION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to submit a motion, that next Saturday be occupied as in Committee of the Whole with debate on the President's message, with the understanding that no other business be transacted.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

SURVEYING DISTRICT IN MONTANA.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill erecting the Territory of Montana into a separate surveying district, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

JACOB P. LEESL.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, took up from the files a report from the Court of Claims made to the House of Representatives at the second session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, for the relief of Jacob P. Leese; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

EMANUEL MARQUIS.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Emanuel Marquis; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

ONE HUNDRED DAYS MEN.

Mr. McKEE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas certain persons who served in what was known as the organization of one hundred days men, it appears, were, while in said service, drafted under the laws and orders providing a draft to fill the Army, and paid the $300 commutation money provided in said law: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish this House with copies of the orders authorizing said organization of one hundred days men, and also copies of all orders from said Department, if any orders were issued, protecting the men who entered said service from the effects of the draft.

PENNSYLVANIA INSTITUTE.

Mr. ANCONA, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to consider the propriety of providing, in any bill they may report for the amendment of the internal revenue laws, for the exemption of the Pennsylvania Institute for the Instruction of the Blind from taxation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by its Chief Clerk, Mr. McDONALD, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask that this bill be taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the select committee, and that it be printed for the use of the House, with the privilege of reporting it back when the Freedmen's Bureau bill is reached as a special order.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

MINERAL LANDS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, presented the preamble and resolutions adopted by the miners' convention of the State of California, on the subject of the disposal of the mineral lands of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House ten thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Patents for the year 1863-64, instead of the twenty thousand ordered.

PROTECTION OF RAILROAD PASSENGERS.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals is hereby directed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law similar in spirit to the steamboat inspection laws, for the protection of the lives of passengers on railroad cars, and to report by bill or otherwise.

J. JUDSON BARCLAY.

Mr. NEWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of J. Judson Barclay; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

BOOKS FOR DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Joint Committee on the Library:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized and required to purchase — copies of the proposed publication of the debates in the first Senate of the United States from a journal kept by Hon. William Maclay, a Senator of Pennsylvania in the first Senate, the same to be paid for out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on the order of the said Clerk, on the delivery of the books; said books to be for the use of the members of the House of Representatives for distribution: Provided, That the price of said books shall not exceed the sum of $—.

INCOME TAX.

Mr. ROSS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the exemption of $800 in the income tax to $1,000; also to inquire into the expediency of increasing the tax on incomes of $25,000 and upward to twenty-five per cent.

COMPENSATION FOR HORSES.

Mr. DEFREES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act to provide for the payment of horses and other property destroyed in the military service of the United States, approved March 3, 1849; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SPALDING moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

CHAPLAINS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HULBURD asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House the names of the present chaplains in the Navy, together with the date of each appointment, and the State from which each appointment was made.

Mr. SPALDING objected.

And then, on motion of Mr. SPALDING, (at twenty minutes past four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 26, 1866.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. Kirkwood to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Pensions occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Foot, and also to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Public Lands occasioned by the resignation of Mr. GRIMES.

FRANCIS CAZEAU.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, the petition and other papers in the case of Jacob Bigelow, administrator of Francis Cazeau; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, information in regard to commissioners and clerks of the district and circuit courts of the United States, together with the amount of fees and emoluments received by each of those officers; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of St. Paul and members of the Minnesota Legislature, who represent to the Congress of the United States that the interruption of the free navigation of the Welland canal by American vessels, and the exclusion of Canadian vessels from the free navigation of Lake Michigan, would materially reduce the facilities of transportation from the northwestern States to eastern markets; and they urge that, by negotiation or concurrent legislation, existing arrangements may be continued, and if possible enlarged, until the States bordering on the great lakes shall be secured in the enjoyment of channels to the ocean sufficient to pass vessels of one thousand tons burden. I move that this paper be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of A. Grether and others, citizens of Quincy, Illinois, praying for the absolute equality of political as well as civil rights before the law of all citizens of the United States, for the prohibition of all class legislation and property qualification, and for free speech, free press, free assembly, and free instruction; and for protection to free intercourse and personal safety; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. STEWART presented a petition of loyal citizens of Colorado, temporarily residing in the city of New York, praying for the admission of Colorado as a State into the Union, with its present constitution; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented the petition of widows of naval officers, praying for an increase of pension to the widows of naval officers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Emma Jane Hall, widow of Rev. Perry Hall, deceased, late chaplain of the seventy-ninth regiment Indiana volunteers, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Sweeney, Rittenhouse, Pant & Co., on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That Gilbert & Gerrish have leave to withdraw their petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that Charles Vinson be permitted to withdraw his papers on the files of the Senate. There was a report made against him; but I understand his purpose is not to make a second application to the Senate; but some of the papers are papers relating to some interests of his own personally, and he desires to withdraw them from the files of the Senate. I believe that can be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be entered if there be no objection.

Mr. CLARK. Sometimes it is very important that papers of that kind should be retained on the files of the Senate. I inquire of the Senator whether he has examined the papers. [Mr. JOHNSON. I have not.] They had better be examined, I think, before permission is given.

Mr. JOHNSON. The claim was for extra compensation as clerk in the Department of State at the time when he was assigned to the duty of Acting Secretary of State. It has been decided several times that such compensation should not be made.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will permit me, then, I will send and get the papers, and see that there is nothing improper in withdrawing them.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.
Leave was subsequently granted to withdraw the papers.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 58) granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon road from Corvallis to the Acquia bay, reported it with amendments.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 38) for the relief of Charlotte Bence, widow of Philip H. Bence, late captain of company F, thirtieth regiment Iowa volunteer infantry, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 101) to provide for the improvement of certain harbors in the State of Ohio; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting pensions to the widows and minor children of enlisted men who were enlisted or detailed as artificers, and report by bill or otherwise.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT TOPEKA.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating $100,000 for the erection of a court-house and post office at the city of Topeka, the capital of the State of Kansas, to report by bill or otherwise.

BONDS OF BANK DIRECTORS.

Mr. POLAND submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire as to the expediency of providing by law that directors of banks organized under the authority of the laws of the United States shall give bonds for the faithful performance of their duties as such directors, and report by bill or otherwise.

APPROVAL OF LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 12th instant, a joint resolution (S. R. No. 7) for increasing the bond of the Superintendent of Public Printing.

BONDED WAREHOUSES.

Mr. MORGAN. I move now to take up for consideration House bill No. 135, to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods for consumption from public store and bonded warehouse, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that until the 1st day of April, 1866, any goods, wares, or merchandise under bond, in any public or private bonded warehouse, upon which the duties are unpaid, may be withdrawn for consumption, and the bonds canceled on payment of the duties and charges prescribed by law; and that any goods, wares, or merchandise deposited in bond, in any public or private bonded warehouse, on and after the 1st day of April, 1866, and all goods, wares, or merchandise remaining in warehouse, under bond, on that day may be withdrawn for consumption within one year from the date of original importation, on payment of the duties and charges to which they may be subject by law at the time of such withdrawal; and that after the expiration of one year from the date of original importation, and until the expiration of three years from that date, any goods, wares, or merchandise in bond may be withdrawn for consumption on payment of the duties assessed on the original entry and charges, and an additional duty of ten per cent. of the amount of such duties and charges.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRAGUE afterward submitted a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill; and that motion was entered.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

DESTRUCTION OF NAVAL VESSELS.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 94.

Mr. SUMNER. What is the title of it?

Mr. GRIMES. "A bill to amend the act entitled 'An act for the relief of seamen and others borne on the books of vessels wrecked or lost in the naval service,' approved July 4, 1864, and for other purposes."

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. In case any officer of the Navy or Marine corps on board a vessel in the employ of the United States which, by any casualty, or in action with the enemy, has been or may be sunk or otherwise destroyed, shall thereby have lost his personal effects, the bill authorizes the proper accounting officers, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, to allow to such officer a sum not exceeding the amount of his sea pay for one month, as compensation for that loss; but the accounting officers are in all cases to require a schedule and certificate from the officer making the claim for effects so lost; and no allowance is to be made by virtue of this act for any loss incurred prior to the 19th of April, 1861.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill with two amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line ten, after the word "loss" to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That such loss has not occurred through the negligence or want of skill or foresight of the officer making application for such loss.

Mr. CONNESS. Before the amendments are acted upon, perhaps it would be better to have the explanation necessary to a perfect understanding of the bill. I should like to hear the bill explained by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I feel some interest in it.

Mr. GRIMES. The explanation that I have to give in regard to this bill will be very brief. From the foundation of the Government down to this time, I believe there has never been any allowance to any naval officer for any loss that he may have sustained in consequence of the destruction of the vessel of which he was a part of the full complement and of which he was an officer. The reason upon which that rule was based I suppose to be that the officer was responsible for the ship and for the safety of the ship. That rule formerly prevailed in the British navy, but has now been changed there as we propose to change it here. It was established when we had nothing but sailing vessels in the Navy, and before the introduction of steam, before the introduction of torpedoes, and before the introduction of shell guns which are so destructive upon ships. During this war there have been several ships that have been destroyed by torpedoes, the placing of which by the enemy could not have been foreseen by the officers in charge of the ships or the men upon them. It did not strike the Committee on Naval Affairs that in a case of that kind the old rule should be adhered to. We all thought that an officer who, in the proper discharge of his duty, without any want of foresight or skill, and not on account of any negligence or malfeasance on his part, should be entirely stripped of all his personal effects should receive some compensation, and we have therefore provided that in cases of that kind, under the direction and with the approbation of the Secretary of the Navy, there shall be allowed to him the sum of one month's sea pay.

In the British service, the amount that is allowed to a flag officer under similar circumstances is £300, or $1,500; to a fleet captain, £150, or $750; to a commodore or captain, £200, or $1,000; to a lieutenant, £80, or $400; to a gunner or boatswain, £30, or $150; and to a midshipman, £40, or $200. If this bill should become a law, a vice admiral in our service would receive $625, against $1,500 in the British service; a rear admiral would get $416; a commodore $333, against $1,000 in the British service; a captain $291, instead of $1,000 in the British service; a lieutenant $156 instead of $400 in the British service; an ensign, $100; and a midshipman, $41.

Mr. WADE. What do sailors get?

Mr. GRIMES. Sailors now get a much larger amount in proportion than the sum that is allowed to officers. We pay them sixty dollars in any event, under the law that we passed two years ago. The youngest boy that may be enlisted into the service gets sixty dollars, while a midshipman in the service under this bill only gets forty-one dollars, not enough, in my opinion; but still we had to establish some rule, and we thought this was the best rule that we could devise.

The second section of the bill was inserted by the committee at the instance of the Treasury officers. I have a letter in my desk from the Fourth Auditor insisting upon it that the seventh section of the act of February 24, 1864, ought to be and must necessarily be repealed in order to enable the Treasury officers to settle the accounts of seamen. That section provided that

The bounty money which any mariner or seaman enlisting from the Army into the Navy may have received from the United States or from the State in which he enlisted in the Army, shall be deducted from the prize money to which he may become entitled during the time required to complete his military service.

It will strike every man, I imagine, as an impossibility for the Fourth Auditor who has the investigation of these accounts to ascertain how much John Smith or John Roe may have received from the State of Massachusetts or the State of Ohio to induce him to enter into the Army. The result is, therefore, that all the accounts of these seamen are suspended. More than two or three thousand of them, I understand, must remain in that state of suspense until either this bill is passed, or the Treasury officers shall be satisfied as to the amount of bounty they may have received from the States. It is for the Treasury to ascertain these facts. For the reason I have stated the committee have proposed to repeal that section of the law. I believe I have now stated all there is in connection with this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. It appears to me that the compensation proposed by the first section of this bill is a very small one indeed, and cannot by any possibility in many instances cover the personal loss of the officer. It appears to me that it is entirely just and equitable to make them a reasonable and fair compensation. I do not wish to offer an amendment, as this matter has been considered in the committee; but I submit to the honorable chairman of the committee that, in many instances, indeed in some that have come to my own knowledge, the personal loss of the officer exceeds five or six times the amount of compensation he would receive under this bill, and it is hardly fair to deal with these officers in that way. I further suggest whether it would not be better to provide for ascertaining what the personal loss in such cases might be.

Mr. GRIMES. The bill does provide for that. It says:

Provided, That the accounting officers shall in all cases require a schedule and certificate from the officer making the claim for effects so lost: And provided further, That no allowance shall be made by virtue of this act for any loss incurred prior to the 19th day of April, 1861.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator, I think, scarcely understands my suggestion. In no case, although that schedule is required to be presented, as I understand it, is the compensation to be more than the amount of his sea-pay for one month; so that although the schedule may set forth that his loss may have exceeded that six times, and that that loss has not occurred by any negligence of his, but in action with the enemy, he receives the amount of sea pay for one month, which is a very poor and trifling compensation. It appears to me that it is hardly dealing either justly or generously with these men.

Mr. GRIMES. I agree fully with what the Senator from California has said in regard to the amount that is allowed by this bill. I do not think that it is as much as ought to be allowed to these officers; but it was very difficult for us to determine the criterion by which we should be governed. It occurred to me, and to those who were interested in the bill, that two months' pay was too much, and it was necessary for us to make some absolute data on which to predicate the bill. I think that the officers who have suffered during this war from the loss of their property would infinitely prefer taking the amount specified here than not getting anything at all, as has been the case heretofore.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no doubt that is the case; but I ask the Senator, why not have a provision which shall provide for ascertaining the loss in such cases, and for allowing the actual loss?

Mr. GRIMES. For this reason: some men may have a much more extensive kit than others.

Mr. CONNESS. Then provide that it shall not exceed a certain sum.

Mr. GRIMES. I supposed that this would nearly cover the value of the articles that it was necessary for some of these officers to have. Others may have quite extensive wardrobes, and where they exceed in value that which we believe a prudent and economical man ought to have, the Government does not want to pay for it. I think myself that we had better pass the bill as it stands, and if it is necessary to amend it in the future it can be done.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the seventh section of the act of Congress, approved February 24, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, A. D. 1863," as provides that "the bounty money which any mariner or seaman enlisting from the Army into the Navy may have received from the United States, or from the State in which he enlisted in the Army, shall be deducted from the prize money to which he may become entitled during the time required to complete his military service," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. CONNESS. Yesterday, when the bill for the extension of the Freedmen's Bureau was being voted upon, I said that I would move its reconsideration for the honorable member from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON;] but I learn that the bill has gone to the House of Representatives. Preceding a motion to reconsider, I move that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to ask for the return of the bill from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope there will be no action on that now unless to vote it down.

Mr. CONNESS. I presume that this is a courtesy due to the Senator from Maryland, so that he may be able to have an opportunity to submit whatever remarks he may have to make, on a motion to reconsider, when the bill comes back, and then the Senate may vote that motion down if that be their sense. I trust that no objection will be made to this course, because I think it is the usual course in the Senate and is due to the Senator. I hope the question will be taken without opposition on the motion to call the bill back. It will not delay it long. We can act upon it before we adjourn. I hope that course will be taken.

Mr. JOHNSON. The suggestion that I made yesterday to the Senate, and particularly to the chairman of the committee, was, that under the circumstances in which we were at that time, it seemed to me but proper that the bill should not be finally disposed of until we should have an opportunity of seeing what objections to the bill were to be found in a communication made by the Governor of South Carolina to the President of the United States, and which we were informed would be laid upon the tables of Senators to-day. I am very much inclined to think that but for the understanding to which we came yesterday, an understanding to which the member from California and myself were more particularly the parties, but an understanding apparently acquiesced in by the members of the Senate, the vote would not have been taken yesterday at all, or might not have been taken. All that I ask is that that understanding shall be carried out now.

I was not aware until I came into the Senate, being engaged elsewhere, and not coming in at the time of the assembling of the Senate, that the honorable member from California had failed to make his motion to reconsider; but I found that the motion had not been made, and that the Clerk, in the discharge of his duty, had transmitted the bill to the House of Representatives. All that I desire is that the bill shall be brought back. The communication of the Governor of South Carolina is on our tables, and it appears to me—I have read it—to contain matters of very serious importance which the Senate ought to consider before it decides finally. All that I wish to say, if it comes back, will be said in a very short time; and the Senate will be able to pass upon the bill certainly without any unreasonable delay caused by any remarks which I shall make. I do not see that it is so important to the success of the measure that the bill should be acted upon by the House of Representatives now, to-day, or that it is at all probable that the bill will be acted upon to-day if the House is suffered to retain possession of it. If we get it back, and the Senate pass the bill in the shape in which it now is, or if they shall think proper to amend it in any particular, it will go to the House on Monday morning, and I suppose the final decision of the House would be about as early as it would be if the motion made so kindly by the honorable Senator from California was acquiesced in. I have nothing more to say. The Senate may dispose of it as they think proper.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Davis, Foster, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stockton, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Cragin, Dixon, Doollittle, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cowan, Creswell, Fessenden, Foot, Henderson, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Poland, and Ramsey—10.

So the motion was not agreed to.

PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution introduced by me providing for provisional governments for certain communities.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 11) in relation to the organization of provisional governments within the States whose people were lately in rebellion was considered as in Committee of the Whole, the question being on the motion of Mr. Howe, to refer the resolution to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, it is not often, I think, that a resolution encounters so rough a passage on its way to the committee as the resolution which I had the honor to introduce on the 10th instant has encountered. It was offered on the 10th, and has not reached the committee yet. Considering the two very formidable assaults made upon it by the honorable Senator from Maryland and by my colleague, it seemed to me proper that I should not allow it to go to the committee without a few remarks in reply to what they urged against it, and I have been in no haste to make that reply. For myself, consulting my own feelings, I should have preferred to submit such remarks as I had to urge in reply immediately on the conclusion of the speeches made by the Senator from Maryland and by my colleague respectively. I did seek the floor for the purpose of replying to the Senator from Maryland; it was not the pleasure of the Senate to hear me at that time, and it has not been in my power to obtain the floor until this time. That has, however, occasioned me no particular embarrassment. I have not labored under any such embarrassment as seemed to have overtaken the Senator from Maryland. He thought he ought not to allow the remarks which I submitted to the Senate to go to the country a single day without an attempt to reply. I have been entirely willing that the remarks which he took occasion to make to the Senate should go to the country days and weeks without an effort to reply. Indeed, sir, I am not at all anxious. I am not at all concerned, for the effect of this debate upon the country. So far as I participate in the debate, I do not seek to speak to the country. I desire on this occasion, as on the former occasion, to address myself to the Senate. It seems to me that at this time above all others in the history of our country we should stop talking to the country, and that the Senate should reason together as to what ought to be done in this very critical emergency. It is no time to build up parties; it is no time to inculcate doctrine; it is no time for missionary work; it is time for legislative deliberation. There is work enough for us all to do; and the particular work, allow me to say, to which I wish the national Legislature to address itself is a work in which no political party that lives now, or ever did live in this country, has any partisan interest. It is a work which ought not to be left to the hands of any party. It is a work to which all parties, in my judgment, ought to address themselves. What is it, sir?

All my life I have known, as other Senators about me know, that there has been deposited away down at the bottom of American society a great mass of unassorted humanity which has not had a fair chance in American society, has not had a fair chance in the world. Now, if Government be an estate enjoyed by those who possess its prerogatives, perhaps they are entirely right in ignoring this mass of humanity; if it be a trust to be employed for the benefit of the governed rather than the governors, there is no portion of American society which, in my judgment, commends itself to honest government so heartily, so cordially, so emphatically as the very class to which I refer; and I think they come before us at this time with peculiar claims because of the circumstances in which the country rests to-day.

This resolution upon which I wish to address the Senate has reference to society existing in a portion of the country which formerly constituted eleven States of the American Union. There are to be found millions of uneducated and uncultured colored men who by a national decree have been made free, have been changed from chattels to men in the eye of the law. There are other millions, or there are other numbers, I do not know that they amount to millions, who have been reduced from men almost to chattels because of their fidelity to our flag, to our Constitution, and to this country. These two classes of American society seem to me to demand some protection, some care, some nourishment which they have not hitherto received. It is for them I speak.

Sir, I have thought that it belonged to republican institutions to carry out, to execute the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence, to make men equal. That they are not equal in social estimation, that they are not equal in mental culture, that they are not equal in physical stature, I know very well; but I have thought the weaker they were the more the Government was bound to foster and protect them. If Government be designed for the protection of the weak, certainly the weaker men are the more they need its protection. I know that a great portion of these people on whose behalf I speak are uneducated and ignorant. I have supposed it was within the purpose of republican institutions, and entirely within the power of republican institutions, to give culture and education to them all. I supposed it ought to be done. I was a little startled the other day on hearing the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] start an objection to this. He told us with a good deal of emphasis that it would not do to have every man as learned and as cultivated as the Senator from Massachusetts. What will you do for boot-blacks? says the Senator from Pennsylvania. What will you do for men to perform your menial offices? The inquiry had not occurred to me. It did startle me. It is rather a solemn warning. It did awaken me from the dream in which I had indulged for a great many years. It ought to be attended to. You who think men, American citizens, ought to be made equal, take care that you do not destroy the profession of boot-black. You that think that in the course of coming generations all men are to be brought up and placed upon a plane of political equality, listen to the solemn admonition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who sends his warning down the line of these coming generations and charges you to be careful, be careful how you enlarge your universities; you had better shut up your academies, your school-houses; if you do not take care you will have nobody to black your boots!

Well now, Mr. President, this is a serious matter; it commends itself to you gentlemen who have your names fairly writ on the conservative list; you must take heed to it. As for myself, I am washed out of that fraternity. Ever since I have taken any part in political affairs, I have been so firmly and so fully wedded to the idea that it was the work of the law, as of the gospel, to bring all men up to their utmost capacity, that I am bound to prosecute that labor myself. I must go along in that path. I am hopelessly committed to it. I must follow it out, even if my boots go unblacked.

But, sir, I do not admit that any consequence so dire as that would follow. Something may be done yet to secure a class of men to perform these menial offices. We have not tested the stretch of our social capabilities yet; we do not know how much can be done for the preservation of American society by associated effort. Suppose you organize societies for the propagation of boot-blacks, would that not do something for us to save us from this calamity?

I have thought of another thing. It was suggested to me by what I remember in the economy of a very thrifty man in the town in which I was raised in the State of Maine. The State of Maine was when I lived there rather too far north to cultivate corn to advantage—the seasons were not quite long enough. In one particular year, however, I remember the season was very long, the frosts were late, and the corn ripened remarkably well. It was the habit of farmers there to use the unripe corn—what they called the soft corn—to feed to their swine, and so they called it hog corn. One year the corn ripened very well, and one farmer whom I remember in the town in which I was raised was so very fortunate or unfortunate that his corn all ripened and he had no soft corn for his swine. Of course his swine could not be allowed to go without corn, and so he swapped with his neighbors who were not circumstanced in the same way—swapped his sound corn for soft corn to feed to his hogs. When the time comes that American society is all educated above the capacity to black boots, perhaps something can be done in the way of exchange to supply us. Undoubtedly we shall reach that point many years ahead of Europe, or Asia, or Africa. Can we not swap our cultivated men who cannot perform menial offices for uncultivated men who cannot do anything else and drive a good business at it?

Mr. CONNESS. We do it now.

Mr. HOWE. We have got plenty of boot-blacks now, and we have not much of anything else, I am sorry to say. [Laughter.] How much will it not add to our commerce when we can send out a ship-load of SUMNERS and bring back a cargo of chimney-sweeps! [Laughter.] You see we could not afford to make an even exchange, man for man. Undoubtedly one such cargo would bring two of the chimney-sweeps. A ship-load of BROWNS would bring back a whole argosy of boot-blacks.

It seems to me it would add very much to our commerce; and we should be carrying it on, you see, upon precisely the principle upon which Great Britain is carrying on her commerce with us now. She sends a very little cloth, and gets back in exchange a great deal of raw material of cotton and of food. We should repay her with the same policy; we should export very little mind and import a great deal of muscle in payment for it. So, sir, I am not apprehensive that we shall be left entirely destitute of the means of getting our boots blacked, even if we prosecute the old effort on which I have been so intent.

I said, sir, that I had been in no haste to make this reply. I said that I had felt no occasion for alarm; and yet I have noticed some things which ought, perhaps, to have alarmed me. Commenting upon the very able speech of the Senator from Maryland, I noticed that the New York Times pronounced its logic masterly. I do not know but that as a sincere and honest friend of this Administration I ought to have been alarmed by such a commentary as that, when you consider that the logic of the Senator from Maryland stamped everything which has been done by the President of the United States since the surrender of the rebel armies as illegal, illegitimate, and revolutionary. I do not know but that the friends of the Administration ought to have been alarmed when an organ which styles itself the chief, the leading supporter of the President, characterized its logic as masterly. Still, notwithstanding that, I have waited until the present time before claiming the attention of the Senate any further upon this resolution. Now, sir, what is to be said?

I have first to say that what I had the honor to submit to the Senate on the 10th instant in the shape of argument remains untouched. Neither the Senator from Maryland nor my colleague has assailed any argument which I thought fit to construct or to submit to the Senate. Leaving what I said in defense of my resolution untouched, they have taken the resolution upon themselves severally and have sought to construct an argument against it. I have, therefore, not to reaffirm anything I said on that occasion; I shall address myself on the contrary entirely to what they have said, and I propose as briefly as I can to state the reasons why the arguments which they have severally constructed do not strike me as conclusive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that that measure be postponed, and that the Senator from Wisconsin be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the unfinished business of yesterday, and all prior orders, be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall object to that motion prevailing. I am willing, as the Senator from Wisconsin is in the midst of his remarks, that the order for this hour shall be laid aside until he can conclude them; but I cannot consent that the bill which is now regularly in order shall lose its place. I have no objection to its being laid aside informally until the Senator concludes his remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON. That course is satisfactory to me, and I make that motion instead of the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion now is, that the special order be laid aside until the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Under such an order, will that bill come up when he is through?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the bill be laid aside informally by unanimous consent, it can be called up at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin; and if there be no objection that will be regarded as the order of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection to that course.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the resolution which I submitted to the Senate simply declares for certain reasons recited in the preamble that Congress ought to establish provisional governments for those districts which were lately in rebellion against the authority of the United States. The Senator from Maryland concludes that the reasons assigned in the preamble were unsound. One of those reasons was that the functions of States in those districts had been suspended; another reason was that the time for restoring them had not yet come; and the third reason was that military governments, the substitute for States which has hitherto prevailed there, were unfit for the government of any people.

The Senator from Maryland concludes that the functions of those States have not been suspended. Why? The first reason he assigns is that the war could not have suspended them. He tells us that the United States cannot declare war against a State. I never asserted that it could. The proposition was very ably, and I think conclusively, maintained by the Senator; but after all it does not seem to me to have elucidated this discussion. He tells us that two of the most distinguished members of that Convention which framed our Constitution declared that the United States ought not to make war upon a State. He declares that the Supreme Court of the United States has asserted, since the Constitution was adopted, that Congress cannot declare war against a State. He cites these two authorities to the American Senate as if they sustained one and the same principle. If he had told us the reason why Mr. Madison and Mr. Hamilton thought the United States ought not to make war upon a State, I think he would have done a great deal to enlighten the Senate in reference to our relations to these very communities.

Sir, what was the reason why Mr. Madison and Mr. Hamilton thought the United States ought not to make war upon a State? They were in convention to frame a Constitution for the purpose of securing a more perfect Union. What was the imperfection in that Union? It was that the laws of the Federal Congress were addressed not to the people but to the States, and the States were sovereign; that they had the right to pass upon the validity of those laws and to obey or disobey them as they pleased. Whenever, therefore, Congress enacted a law which any State did not approve it refused to obey; and when one State disobeyed one law, it was made the pretext for another State disobeying another law which was unsatisfactory to it. To amend these difficulties was the purpose of that Convention. A great many propositions were submitted to it, one of which—and if I remember aright it emanated from New Jersey, being offered by Mr. Patterson—proposed to let the States still remain sovereign, but to empower the Federal Government to enforce any laws it might pass by war; whenever a State refused to obey a law of Congress, that war be declared against that State: let it refuse obedience at the peril of war. Against that proposition Mr. Madison and Mr. Hamilton exclaimed. They said we cannot maintain a union where war is a recognized means, an ordinary means of executing the laws; the sovereignty of these several States must, therefore, be abandoned; you must not have a union of sovereign States; but you must have a union of all the people within all the States, and you must have a Government for the guidance and control of those people; limit its powers as you please, but whatever power you give to that Government must be exerted against every individual alike; its commands, its precepts, must be addressed, not to the States, but to the people. That is what was called the national plan, and that is the plan which was adopted. Consequently you have States not sovereign as they existed before the Constitution was adopted, but subordinate as they stand to-day.

True, the Supreme Court has said that war cannot be declared against a State; and if Senators will just cast their eye upon any State in the Union now they will see the reason why war cannot be declared. Look at the State of Ohio; see what makes the State of Ohio. There is a people existing within certain boundaries, clothed by the Constitution of the United States with certain powers, among which is the power to choose, by certain districts to be prescribed by herself, Representatives and Senators to a State Legislature, to enact laws for the government of the people in reference to such matters as are left under the control of the State; authorized by this same Constitution to choose a Governor to execute those laws; authorized by this same Constitution to appoint the judges of courts, to interpret laws, and to apply them to the rights of individuals. There is the State of Ohio. While she stands within that orbit she is only exerting powers which somebody must exert, which, if the people of Ohio do not exert for themselves must be exerted by somebody else for them, and they are powers which, by the Constitution, are excluded from the authority of Congress. There is a mere aggregation of people larger than a county, and with powers more extensive than those of a county, but still limited, circumscribed by the Constitution of the United States. There is nothing but people with these prerogatives; there is no power; there is no force; there is no authority; there is neither an army nor a navy, nor the right to create an army or a navy.

Now, tell me why should Congress declare war against a State like that of Ohio? What is there to fight? You might as well marshal troops against a vapor; there is no force, there is nothing there to resist you. The Almighty himself might as well lead the columns of His planets upon the earth while it is pursuing its course in its own orbit, as for the United States to declare war against the State of Ohio, or against any other State, so long as it confines itself to the sphere prescribed to it by the supreme law of the land. But, sir, when the earth steps out of its orbit there is apt to be a collision, and when a State steps out of its orbit and ceases to be the organization which the Constitution prescribes, there may be a collision, as there has been between the United States and the people of the eleven districts which constituted what we call the seceded States. If the Supreme Court mean to say, or if the Senator from Maryland means to affirm, that the United States cannot make war upon any State, I must insist that they are very much mistaken, or else we have been very much mistaken during the last four years. We can make war upon every State on the face of the earth except a State which is pursuing its course, which is discharging its duty, which is meeting its obligations as prescribed to it by the Constitution of the United States. While it is within that orbit it is safe, it is protected; all the laws of the land are thrown around it; it is as safe against the war powers of the United States as I am when I am going from the Capitol to my boarding-house, or returning from my boarding-house to the Capitol; the people aggregated into a State are as safe as any individual in any of the States is against the war powers of the United States; there is no more occasion for making war, and no more right to make war, upon them than there is upon an individual. And so, sir, I do not say, and I never contended, and I never thought for a moment, that the people of these districts lost the prerogatives of States through the war which has been made upon them, or which was made by them upon us. They lost it before the war commenced, so to speak; they went to work themselves, before war was inaugurated, and took down the State which the Constitution permitted to them, and established another as unlike that which the Constitution permits as is a German State to an American State, or as is a Mexican State to an American State.

But the Senator from Maryland next insists that those State governments did not destroy themselves, because they did nothing but enact ordinances of secession, and those ordinances were illegal. I conceded the other day that if that had been all they did, that would not have authorized Congress to provide provisional governments for them. I pointed out what more it was that they did do; that in addition to enacting their ordinances of secession they placed every local organ and tribunal under an oath not to support the Constitution of the United States, but to resist the Constitution of the United States, and then they made flagrant war upon the United States. The issue right here between the Senator from Maryland and myself is as broad and as clearly defined as it could well be. The Senator from Maryland affirms that when the government which represented the people of South Carolina had enacted her ordinance of secession, had placed the whole local authority in the hands of local agents or tribunals which were sworn to resist and overthrow the Constitution of the United States; which had destroyed and crushed out every Federal organism existing within that community; which had raised armies in defiance of the Constitution of the United States; which had made war upon our flag; which had bombarded our forts; which had taken possession of our property in defiance of us, that that still remained an American State, entitled to the prerogatives which the Constitution confers upon an American State, and must be respected as such. I say, on the other hand, that when that thing was done there was not the vestige of an American State there; there was not a feature which belongs to an American State as defined by the Constitution; and there was scarcely a man in that whole community who was not a criminal before the law, and who was not only not to be respected as a Governor, or a judge, or a legislator of a State is to be respected, but was to be respected as the law respects him, as a felon and a traitor.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire what disposition he proposes to make of the organizations which have been formed during the last six months in these States under the invitation of the President of the United States. What is to become of them?

Mr. HOWE. If my friend will propose that question to me a little later in the course of my remarks, I shall have great pleasure in telling him what I propose to do with them.

Mr. STEWART. Any time will do.

Mr. HOWE. Just now it is not in the order of my remarks, and I may forget it when I come to the point where I would like to give the information. I think it is not difficult, however, to apprehend what disposition I would make of them.

But the Senator from Maryland next proceeds to argue that these States cannot be destroyed, and that their prerogatives cannot be destroyed, because a great deal of our legislation still recognizes them as States, and he goes on to cite statute after statute which he insists recognizes those communities as existing States. I am bound to say that upon this point he made a very strong case; but I do not think he made so strong a case as he might have made. If he had prosecuted his inquiries still further he would have found, not only the statutes which he has cited here, but he would have found other statutes upon our law-books which expressly and explicitly declare that the most of those communities are States; that Arkansas is a State; that Texas is a State; that Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama are States. If he had gone further in the investigation he would have ascertained that two years ago, I think, or three years ago, I myself voted to admit representatives from Arkansas upon this floor, upon the ground that our statutes still declared Arkansas to be a State, and I thought the Senate of the United States could not ignore that statute.

But, sir, I propose legislation; that is what this resolution calls for; and you cannot bar the exercise of the legislative powers of Congress simply by an act of legislation. If your statute-books up to this year contained nothing but statutes proclaiming Arkansas to be a State, that of itself would not prevent this Congress from enacting a law declaring that Arkansas was not a State and creating a provisional government for it. There might be rights vested under those acts which we ought not, and perhaps could not, take away; but all the rights which those acts have conferred upon those communities, I say, they have themselves abjured, and there is nothing left but our bare declaration which recognizes them as States. I thought that the Senate, in passing upon the question of the admission of Senators from these States, ought not have ignored those statutes; but I said then that Congress could repeal them, and Congress ought to repeal them, in my judgment; I think so still; and upon that ground I voted to admit those representatives from Arkansas upon this floor. I believe the Senator from Maryland voted to exclude them. If he held Arkansas to be a State, I would be curious to know upon what ground he could justify his vote to exclude them from this Senate. If the Constitution gives to a State any right whatever, it is a right to be represented in this body by two representatives. It is a right given to every State. Wherever you find an American State, it has the right to send two representatives to this Senate. The Senate is composed of two members from each State, chosen by the Legislatures of the different States.

If the Senator said then, or says now, that Arkansas was then a State, I cannot conceive upon what ground he can justify his vote excluding her representatives. What reason was there? Perhaps all the people of Arkansas did not participate in the election of the Legislature which chose those Senators. Why did they not participate in it? Because they would not; because they were in rebellion. The Senators chosen represented, nobody doubted, the loyal people of the State of Arkansas. What reason was there, therefore, for excluding those Senators from their seats here, except that they did not represent the men who were fighting against the flag of the United States? I thought that that small portion of Arkansas ought not to be treated as the State of Arkansas, and I thought the Legislature ought to relieve the Senate, to relieve the House of Representatives, to relieve the President, to relieve every branch and agency of the Government from the necessity of respecting that small portion of the people as the State of Arkansas; but until we were relieved I did not think I was authorized to ignore these statutes; so I voted for their admission.

And so upon the same ground precisely I voted to count the electoral vote given by Arkansas and Louisiana and Tennessee in the choice of President and Vice President. I thought if they were States they had the right to vote for President of the United States. If a State has not the right to vote for President what right has she? If that right be not unequivocally conferred by the Constitution, there is no right given to a State. And yet, I think, the Senator from Maryland voted to deny each of those communities the right to vote for President and Vice President.

I do not concede that all the statutes cited by the Senator from Maryland recognize those communities as States by any manner of means. Some of them I think do, especially some of those cited from the legislation of 1861 and 1862.

But the Senator parades one argument before the Senate that seemed to me not quite sincere. However, I ought not to say that he did not mean it to be sincere. He parades a proclamation issued by the President of the United States in 1861, in which, under the instruction of an act of Congress, the people were invited to pray for the reestablishment of law, order, and peace throughout the whole extent of our country, and because the people were invited, in 1861, by the President of the United States to pray for the reestablishment of law, order, and peace throughout the whole extent of our country, he thinks the Congress of the United States is precluded from insisting that those men who were destroying the peace and order of the country had forfeited the prerogatives which, under the Constitution, are given only to loyal States. I believe that prayer was offered up sincerely, and I believe it has been answered. The Almighty has aided us in bringing the country so far toward peace; in bringing the country to peace if we have it. The war is ended, was ended months since; order has not yet come, but order is within our reach. If we are only as brave and as honest as the Army has been; if we whose business it is to seek order, to invoke order, are only as firm as were those men whose business it was to command peace, the work will be completed. I think those prayers were answered. I think if the Almighty ever aided any country He has aided this. He did not, to be sure, raise up children out of the stones unto the Republic, but He did enable us to raise almost two hundred thousand children out of things for the Republic, and they served the Republic in bringing about this peace. Having answered our prayers in that most signal manner, I do not think we ought to fling the victory back in His face, or trample down the children He raised up for our use into the dust again.

But, sir, there is another difficulty in the way of this resolution suggested by the Senator from Maryland. There is a statute on your books which authorizes the judges of the Supreme Court to partition the country into judicial circuits and to allot the judges of the court to those several circuits, and they have done it, and having apportioned these lately rebellious districts into circuits in accordance with the provisions of those laws, the Senator thinks we must regard them as States because only States are included in such circuits. Why, sir, they have been in such circuits ever since the war commenced; they have been included under these allotments in such circuits. No courts have been held there. It is not absolutely essential, I take it, to the existence of the Government that courts should be held there. They are held in no Territories; they are held nowhere except where there are existing States which allow them to be held; and yet no law is violated by us, no law is disregarded by us; it is their fault that the judges have not been allowed to go there. The tenure of the judges is not affected by the fact that they cannot hold circuits. They still continue to be judges of the Supreme Court, whether they ever take their seat on the bench of a circuit court, or try a case ad nisi prius in their lives or not; and it is only the Supreme Court which is created by the Constitution. The other courts are the creatures of law.

The Senator says that district judges have been appointed for some of these districts, and he accuses me of having voted for their confirmation. I really cannot say that I never did vote for the confirmation of one of those judges. I should be very sorry, however, to have it proved upon me. A great many confirmations have been made, I suppose, while I was sitting in my seat here, and which I must be considered as having voted for, and yet to which I never did give any intelligent assent; and I never did give any intelligent assent to the confirmation of a judge of a district court within any one of those districts. I never meant that a judge should be confirmed to any one of those districts without raising a question upon them. But the fact that such appointments have been made and have been confirmed is no embarrassment to the Legislature. These courts themselves are the creatures of the Legislature. The Senator says that their terms exist during life or good behavior. I think they will not outlast the courts in which they are commissioned, and Congress can abolish to-day or to-morrow, if it sees fit to do so, every one of those districts, and the terms of every one of those judges would expire upon the approval of the act by the President.

The Senator next takes exception to a proposition of mine, which I stated almost as much as a physiological truth as a constitutional one, that the suspension of the functions of a man or of a State was death. He controverts the truth of that proposition. It is so unimportant to the argument of this question that I should let the controversy drop as it stands but for his having cited an authority against it. He finds in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States what he considers and what he lays before the Senate as an authority contradicting this proposition; and what is that? During a war between this country and Great Britain our enemies took possession of the eastern part of the State of Maine and held possession of it. The Supreme Court said that during the time they held possession of it the authority of the Government of the United States was suspended in that portion of the State; and yet he finds as a fact that after the power of the enemy was withdrawn, after they evacuated Castine and all the country to the east of Castine, there was no legislation required to reannex the eastern portion of Maine to the United States. The case does not seem to me to be precisely in point. I never supposed that the paralysis of a limb, the imposition of external force upon any one of the faculties or organs of a man, or of a political community, would necessarily result in death. The proposition which I made was a proposition which I drew from the message of the President of the United States, that the functions of these States were suspended—not one of them, but all of them. And that was true; they were. There was not a single function of a State in action; there was not volition there; there was not even the desire to be a State. Everything which goes to make up the identity of a State was gone, except that there were people and land there; but every power that they exerted, every authority they claimed, was in direct defiance of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, it seems to me that among lawyers this question of power ought not to be a controverted point. It seems to me that by one little simple consideration it ought to be placed beyond dispute. Let us test it. We all admit—everybody says—that every department of this Government of the United States, the Congress, the President, the courts, and every department of the government of the States, is limited and circumscribed by a supreme law. What do we mean by that? We mean that whenever any one of these agencies, any one of these tribunals exerts a power which is outside the limits prescribed to it by the Constitution, that act is null and void. Whoever does it gets no protection in doing it. There is some other department of Government which can administer the proper correction. A State, the Constitution says, cannot make anything but gold and silver a tender in the payment of debts; but suppose the Legislature of a State declares bank bills to be a legal tender; that act is null and void, and the judicial power of the United States can declare it so and can correct the operation of the act. The President of the United States is given the pardoning power, the power to pardon criminals. Suppose Congress undertakes to pardon a man who is convicted of murder, or of treason, or of counterfeiting, after he is sentenced by the courts, or before he is sentenced; would the act of Congress granting that pardon be a good plea in bar; or if enacted after the man had been convicted, would it prevent the President of the United States from executing that sentence upon the criminal? Clearly not. The President of the United States has certain powers given to him. Suppose he exercises powers which are given to some other department of the Government; suppose he undertakes to enact a law of any kind, is any other department of the Government bound to respect that as a law? Clearly not; because he has no legislative powers.

The authority conferred upon a State by the Constitution is limited, is circumscribed. Whenever they act within those limits their acts are to be respected; they are just as much the law of the land, to be respected by all the United States, as any law passed by the Congress of the United States, within the purview of the Constitution of the United States; but when they step outside of it, whatever they do is void. Suppose this Congress does organize a provisional government for South Carolina. If it is not a government then the Legislature that we set up have no right to enact any laws; the Governor whom we appoint has no right to execute those laws; the judges can do nothing; they are trespassers; everything that is done under their authority is null and void; it is a mere trespass; and the citizen who is interfered with by their authority may have his action before the courts for redress. Anybody who undertakes to act by the authority of an illegal tribunal is without protection. Suppose we set up this provisional government, and they enact a law which is claimed to interfere with the rights of some citizen there; suppose he brings an action in the courts averring that the act was done without authority; what will be the judgment of the courts in such a case? Will they undertake to say that that government which we authorized to be set up there as a provisional government is not a government? That was precisely the case that was raised in Rhode Island. There was an act done, a house broken into and entered by the command of those who claimed to be the government of the State of Rhode Island. The defendant claimed that another organization constituted the government of Rhode Island. He brought his action which was to try the legality of that government under which the act was done. It came here to the Supreme Court of the United States. They said, "That is a political question; we cannot try it; the Congress of the United States are and must be the judges of what is the government of a State; they are charged with the duty of sustaining and maintaining those governments, and they must have the right to decide what is and what is not the government." If, therefore, the provisional government which you organize for South Carolina or for Georgia is illegal and unconstitutional, you see there is no possible redress for it; the courts say it is for Congress to determine finally and conclusively what shall be the government for these people in the South, as much as it is for the courts to determine what is the law in a particular case as between citizen and citizen.

But, Mr. President, I wish to detain the Senate for a few moments while I make a brief reference to the remarks submitted by my colleague. He also concludes that the authority, the exercise of which I invoke, on the part of Congress to organize provisional governments for these communities does not exist. His first reason is that it is not in harmony with that plan of reconstruction which he calls the Lincoln-Johnson plan; and the second reason is that it is in harmony with that plan of reconstruction which he calls the Sumner plan. I regret that my colleague is not in his seat at the present time. There were some observations contained in his speech to which I thought I ought to reply, considering them as of a personal character. I thought it a little remarkable—and I will say it although he is not in his seat—that when he was speaking upon a resolution which I had the honor to submit to the Senate myself, and apparently in reply to a speech I made myself, and while he occupied, I think, between three and four hours in the discussion of that resolution, he did not but once in that whole time allude to it without coupling me with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] Whenever he referred to anything touching the resolution, or the position presented by the resolution, it was "the position of the Senator from Massachusetts and my colleague," to use the language which was employed in that speech. It did not seem to me that that was entirely in good taste, and as he has now resumed his seat, I beg leave to say that I thought I could have demanded rather different treatment from his courtesy. I did not see any sort of necessity, I did not see any sort of propriety in the effort to couple me constantly throughout that speech with the Senator from Massachusetts. He knows very well that in the State of Wisconsin, which I have the honor in part to represent, I sustain a very good character, and I really do not think he ought to have attempted to break it down by fastening upon me any such associations, [laughter;] but however, I think if the Senator from Massachusetts can stand it, I can. Sir, if I could not demand this immunity from his courtesy, I think I could from his sense of justice. It has happened to him to know very well indeed in the course of the last ten years that I am not in the habit of advocating views because other gentlemen maintain them, but only because I believe in them myself. If it was my business, if it was my habit to defend opinions because others avouched them, and not because I believed them, I should not undertake to peddle the opinions of the Senator from Massachusetts; I should enter into the employ of the President at once, because it pays better. Such is not my habit. I introduced that resolution—and I do not think my colleague will find it copied from anybody else—because I believed it stated the political truth which is to solve the difficulties now surrounding the country; and I advocated it as well as I could in a speech, which I do not think my colleague will find to have been copied from the Congressional Globe or any other publication, because it was the argument that occurred to me, and I believed it.

But, sir, as to the matter of fact whether this resolution is the Lincoln and Johnson theory or the Sumner theory, the Senator from Massachusetts has not yet, I regret to say, indorsed that resolution, nor anything that I said in support of it; and I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts will claim the right, which under the Constitution, as I understand it, belongs to every Senator on this floor, to speak for himself. If it should hereafter happen to receive his indorsement, it will be very gratifying to me. If I should find that I had given utterance on this floor to one sentiment which is approved by the Senator from Massachusetts, it will be only a small compensation for the great number of living sentiments to which I have listened from the Senator from Massachusetts, and which are bound to live long after my colleague and myself shall have passed from this stage of existence.

While, therefore, Mr. President, I see no warrant in fact for the assertion of my colleague that this is the theory of the Senator from Massachusetts, I deny that he is authorized to say that it is opposed to what he calls the Lincoln and Johnson policy. There are in that preamble and resolution just four simple propositions. Three of them are stated in the preamble by way of postulates. One of them is, that the functions of these States are suspended. I took that literally and verbatim from the message of the President of the United States. The second is, that the time for restoring them has not yet arrived. I did not take that literally from the President of the United States. He has not said it, but he has not affirmed to the contrary, nor has my colleague; and I venture to say that neither the President of the United States, nor my colleague, nor any man who calls himself the supporter of the President of the United States, will venture to stand here before the American people and say that the time has come for at once restoring to the people of those districts the prerogatives and the functions of States. I wait yet to hear the first man assert that proposition. My colleague himself only says that he thinks we should call them States and begin to see whether we will let them act as States; that we should call them States now and then see how far it will do to trust them to exercise the prerogatives of States; take up the cases of their Representatives and act upon them, one by one, with as much deliberation as we please. Sir, I want to say for myself that if the Congress of the United States shall determine that these are States, I shall revert to the Constitution of the United States as to what they have a right to do. When you have declared their character as States, when that is their established condition, I shall say, for one, they have a right to send Senators here and Representatives to the other House, and to participate in the election of your President and Vice President, because the Constitution says so.

The third proposition contained in this preamble is, that military governments, under which the people in those States so-called have been ever since their armies surrendered, are unfit for the government of American society. That proposition I drew directly from the message of the President of the United States. I supported it by an argument quoted at length, verbatim, from his message.

The fourth proposition stands in the resolution itself, and it is but the natural, and, as it seemed to me, the inevitable deduction from the others. If the functions of those States are suspended, if the time has not yet come for restoring them, and if military governments are unsuited for their control, I see no alternative for us but to organize provisional governments for them. I think, therefore, if I were disposed to look about for some man to stand godfather for this little resolution of mine, I might honestly and fairly claim that the President of the United States should act in that capacity. But I am not in search of a godfather; the resolution is before the Senate; it is for them to act upon; and when they have acted upon it, it is to be sent to the House for their action. Unless the Congress of the United States will stand godfather for it, let it drop, as it ought. I want it sanctioned by nobody else. No other tribunal known to our Constitution and laws can give it any sanction.

Mr. President, the speech submitted by my colleague contains a great number of points upon which I should like to comment, but it would not answer to occupy the time of the Senate for that purpose. Some of them, however, I must mention. Considering that he is the representative of the Union party, I thought it very unfortunate that he should have taunted the Senate and the Congress of the United States with the passage of a resolution which he quotes from the legislation of 1861. He says that immediately after our humiliating reverse at Bull Run:

"In that hour of defeat, when humbled before the nations, and before the supreme Ruler of the world, Congress, almost unanimously in both Houses, declared—

"That this war is not prosecuted upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and all laws made in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

He says that resolution was adopted in the hour of defeat and in the hour of national humiliation, as if Congress, had they deliberated a little longer till they survived the humiliation of that Bull Run disaster, would have refused to pass such a resolution as that; and the intimation is that now, proving victorious instead of defeated, we see fit to disregard it and set it aside altogether. Sir, do we not all know what the palpable fact was? The first months of this war, I am sorry to say the first years of this war, were spent in the vain, idle, and hopeless effort to put down the rebellion after a fashion which would enable us to make believe that there never had been any rebellion. We were trying, not to overcome our enemies, but to just hold them still; and this resolution was the deliberate expression of the Congress of the United States at that time. We were then prosecuting the war, all the time holding out to our enemies terms of reconciliation, of conciliation, and of peace. Why, sir, for the first year of the war our very bayonets carried laurels upon them; we thought softly. When this resolution was adopted, I believe we were all on what is called the sixty-day paper; we were going to put down the insurrection in just about sixty days, and then we were going to make believe there never had been any insurrection. Of course it was not then the purpose of the Government, it was not the purpose of those who adopted this resolution, to interfere with those political organizations which were called States; not to interfere with their institutions, not to interfere even with the existence of slavery within them, not to interfere with any of their laws. We did then propose this resolution. We proposed it for the purpose of appealing to the magnanimity of the people down there to lay down their arms and not to prosecute that insurrectionary attempt to the bitter end of the bitterest of wars. But we found in the course of months, what I think wise and sagacious men foresaw in the very outset of these hostilities, that all these efforts at conciliation, at reconciliation, were vain. We found that there was only one way of obtaining peace with these enemies of the people of the United States, and that was by whipping them; and when your armies were organized and officered and maneuvered upon that system of tactics, peace began to show itself, and not till then.

But I do not think it was exactly right to intimate that the American Congress was insincere or dishonest when it adopted that resolution, or that it is faithless to that resolution now when a different policy is suggested to it. The doctrines of that resolution were departed from long ago. Then we declared that at that time we did not propose to interfere with the institution of slavery. We did interfere with the institution of slavery several years ago, and the institution of slavery has ceased to exist. Was that a violation of this joint resolution which was passed in 1861? Why, sir, the American people, taking the power out of our hands, superseding its Congress, decreed of themselves, that in spite of this resolution and of all the local laws in those districts, slavery should cease to exist. We were going to preserve the States with all their dignity and rights unimpaired. How well we have persevered in that policy I shall have occasion to remark hereafter.

But, Mr. President, my colleague differs not only from myself in his views of what should be done at the present time, but he differs very materially, as is evident, from the Senator from Maryland. The Senator from Maryland insists that these communities were always States; that we were prosecuting the war simply to disarm the insurgents in them, and that, when that object was accomplished, there the States stood with their organizations complete; that Magrath was Governor of South Carolina; that the men who were elected Senators and Representatives to her Legislature were the Legislature of that State; that the judges appointed by that government still exercised the judicial powers of the State; there was the State complete, with its complete organizations intact. That is the theory of the Senator from Maryland. The theory of my colleague is that we, somehow or other, notwithstanding South Carolina was always a State, did get the right or the power not merely to disarm the insurgents but to overthrow those political organizations. I have been utterly unable to understand from what clause of the Constitution my colleague derives that authority. We not only disarmed the insurgents in South Carolina, but we deposed her Governors, we dismissed her Legislatures, we vacated the seats of all her judges. That has been done. My colleague says it is all right; the Senator from Maryland says it is all wrong. I agree with my colleague that it is right, but not right if South Carolina is a State; right only because South Carolina had forfeited all the prerogatives and all the rights which belong to a State.

My colleague thinks that the President had this power by virtue of the authority vested in him by the laws of the land to make peace. There have been a great many things done in the progress of this war, in the exercise of what were called the war powers of the Government, which I thought a little peculiar; some of which I could hardly undertake to defend under the Constitution of the United States. I have not been distressed about them, for they were all done for good purposes; and if they were illegal, I knew the time would come when redress could be administered, and I thought that redress would come when the war ended, and the war would not last forever. But, sir, the worst of all these things bears no comparison to what has been done in the exercise of what my colleague calls the peace powers of the President. A citizen of Ohio who had represented a district of that State in the Congress of the United States, after he had ceased to represent that district, was arrested by military authority, placed before a military commission, and tried upon some charges or other, and convicted upon those charges. He claimed that it was a tyrannical usurpation of power, an arbitrary act, a gross violation of the Constitution of the United States. Whether it was so or not I will not undertake to say. But what has been done in South Carolina, what has been done in Mississippi and Alabama, under what my colleague calls the peace powers? Not only have citizens, those who were never in the armies of the United States, nor any other army, been arrested time and again and been tried before military commissions, but military commissions have been trying private causes, trespasses, actions of debt, actions of assumpsit, and administering justice between man and man. Not only have they been doing this, but the judges and justices appointed by the people of South Carolina for the very purpose of exercising this authority have been summarily dispossessed of their offices and placed entirely to one side. Not only that, but Legislatures elected by the people of South Carolina to make laws have been dispersed, and now Legislatures have been set up in their stead; Governors have been deposed and other Governors placed in their stead, and this under the exercise of peace powers.

My colleague says that the President had to judge when to disband the Army, and in order to know whether it was safe to disband any portion of the Army he had to make some little investigation in those communities, to see how they felt, and he ventured upon these acts by way of feeling their pulse, investigating the state of public feeling and public sentiment down there. He admits it was a little peculiar that he should appoint agents there and call them provisional governors, but they were only deputies of the President. If the President, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, had gone there himself and done these very things, he argues that nobody would have objected to the constitutionality of them. Sir, I venture to say I would have objected to the constitutionality of them, if South Carolina is to be considered a State of the American Union. If South Carolina is a State, that is what Wisconsin is; that is what Ohio is. The President is indeed Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, but he is no more Commander-in-Chief of the Army in South Carolina than he is in Wisconsin. What he can do in one State as Commander-in-Chief he can do in another. If he can depose a legal, constitutional Governor in one

State he can do it another. I do not see why he cannot. I make no complaint of the President for doing these things in South Carolina. He did not remove a Governor of a constitutional State; he removed a criminal from exercising acts of authority under powers delegated to him by criminals. Not only that, but laws passed by these Legislatures have been set aside over and over again. I make no complaint of it. I believe it was right to set them aside, because I believe there was no community there which had the right to make laws; they were all criminals.

In point of fact, Mr. President, the issue between myself on the one side, and the Senator from Maryland and my colleague on the other, is just this: there were certain laws which once recognized South Carolina, Alabama, and Mississippi to be States. Under those laws, those people had the right to elect Governors and choose Legislatures. South Carolina elected a man by the name of Magrath for Governor of that State. The Senator from Maryland insists that we were prosecuting this war to make Magrath the Governor of South Carolina and to obey the Constitution of the United States; that that is the law that we were trying to enforce in the prosecution of this war. I think it was another law that we were trying to enforce—a law enacted on the 30th of April, 1790, the first section of which declares:

"That if any person or persons owing allegiance to the United States of America shall levy war against them, or shall adhere to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, and shall thereof be convicted, on confession in open court, or on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act of the treason whereof he or they shall stand indicted, such person or persons shall be adjudged guilty of treason against the United States, and shall suffer death."

I think we were prosecuting this war in order to enforce that law against Governor Magrath, against every one of the Representatives in their Legislature, against all their judges. It does not follow, because we have the power to do it, that therefore we should execute the law. We were prosecuting the war that we might be enabled to execute this law if we chose to do it. The President can remit these men from the penalties of this law if he pleases. If he does not, that is a law to be executed, and that is one of the laws to enable us to execute which we were prosecuting this war. Under the penalties of that statute were included not only every agent of what you call the State of South Carolina during the existence of the war, but almost every citizen within the State of South Carolina. The law condemned every one of them to death. When they were disarmed it rested within the discretion of the Government of the United States to say whether this law should be enforced or not. We had only to carry out this law, enacted in 1790, and what would have happened to what you call the State of South Carolina? Not only the Governor, every Representative, and every other municipal agent would have been executed, but every citizen who had incurred this guilt of treason would have been executed. When you had executed every officer and every man, I take it the State of South Carolina and its functions would have been suspended in more senses than one. I conceive that that would have been the end of the State of South Carolina; or if it would not, or if South Carolina would have survived that, where would it have been? What would have been its condition?

Mr. President, upon one point an issue is made between my colleague and myself, and that is upon the question whether it is safe now to restore the prerogatives of States to the people of those communities. My colleague does not exactly assert that it is safe now to do it, but he does say that those people have surrendered, not merely their armies, but their cause. I wish I could believe that; but the fact is it is not true; and I wish to submit to the Senate, not all the evidence that I have before me, but a few extracts from it, to show that it is not true. Mr. Brownlow, or Governor Brownlow, of Tennessee, one of those districts for which the character of States is claimed, but a few days since—

I read from the National Union of the 10th instant—used this language:

"I can only say by way of admonition and encouragement to the colored friends, attend your schools, learn to read the word of God, and then learn to love and practice it; and by way of caution and advice, I admonish you be mild and temperate in your habit and spirit and your conduct toward the white people. I advise as a friend loving the institution and desiring the prosperity of what you have undertaken. I advise the teachers, male and female, to be exceedingly prudent and cautious, and do nothing offensive to the predominant party here.

"You may think it a little strange that I give such counsel. I do it because if General Thomas were to take away his soldiers and pull up stakes and leave here, you would not be allowed to occupy this school-room a week; and if General Thomas and his military forces were to go away and leave us, this Legislature, at the head of which I am placed, would be broken up by a mob in forty-eight hours."

That is the testimony of one who has been chosen the Governor of one of these States, as gentlemen insist upon terming them, and in which my colleague says they have surrendered their whole cause. He tells his constituents and tells the United States that if the military forces belonging to the United States were withdrawn, the Legislature of that State would be broken up in forty-eight hours.

A committee calling themselves the central committee of Tennessee, in a memorial addressed to the committee on reconstruction, which has found its way into the newspapers, use this language:

"The designs of the great secession majority of Tennessee may have been changed by the events of the war, and so may have been their opinions of their own strength, and of the strength of the Government, but unless your memorialists greatly misunderstand them, their sentiments, sympathies, and passions remain unchanged. They welcome peace because they are disabled from making war; they submit because they can no longer resist; they accept results they cannot reject, and profess loyalty because they have a halter around their necks. They recognize the abolition of slavery because they see it before them as a fact; but they say it was accomplished by gross violations of the Constitution—that the negro is free only in fact, but not in law, or of right."

But, Mr. President, I think I can convince you more satisfactorily of the extent to which they have surrendered their cause by reading to you some extracts from a series of chapters drawn by a commission appointed in Florida for the purpose of revising their code. At the head of that commission I find the name of Mr. Dupont who is the chief justice of Florida if Florida has a chief justice. Acting upon the assumption that slavery was destroyed, they conceived that it was necessary to make some changes in their code regulating the colored population of that district. The commission reported ten chapters for that purpose. I have them all before me. They create first a county criminal court, and to that court they give jurisdiction in cases of—

"Assault, assault and battery, assault with intent to kill, riot, affray, larceny, robbery, arson, burglary, malicious mischief, vagrancy and all misdemeanors, and all offenses against religion, charity, morality, and decency."

That is the jurisdiction of that county criminal court. One of the sections declares—

"That in all cases where a fine, penalty, or forfeiture is or may be provided or inflicted by any statute of this State, as the punishment for any offense by the court organized by this act, the person upon whom such fine, penalty, or forfeiture may be imposed, may for the non-payment thereof be put to such labor as the county commissioners of the county in which such fine, penalty, or forfeiture was imposed, may direct, and shall be allowed such compensation for his labor, in reduction of his fine or forfeiture, as may be reasonable and just, and he shall not be held to such labor for a longer period than shall be necessary to pay and satisfy the fine, forfeiture, and penalty so imposed; or the said county commissioners may hire out, at public outcry, the said party to any person who will take him for the shortest time and pay the fine, forfeiture, and penalty as imposed."

The next section provides:

"That all fines, forfeitures, and penalties imposed upon any person by the county criminal court organized by this act, shall be paid into the county treasury, and all legitimate expenses attending a prosecution in the said court shall be provided for and paid out of said treasury; and the compensation of jurors and witnesses called to testify on the part of the prosecution shall be at the option and discretion of the board of county commissioners of the respective counties."

What is the purpose of these clauses? They explain it. They say that before the abolition of slavery there was an excellent tribunal. Their language is—

"Heretofore there existed in each household a tribunal peculiarly adapted to the investigation and punishment of the great majority of minor offenses to the commission of which this class of population was addicted."

That is, the class of population made free by the act of emancipation.

"With the destruction of the institution of negro slavery, that tribunal has become extinct, and hence the necessity of erecting another in its stead, and of making such modifications in our legislation as shall give full efficiency to our criminal code."

Which means briefly this: that when slavery existed, the head of each family was a government for all the slaves belonging to that family; he did his own whipping, administered his own corrections; he made his own laws. That institution having been destroyed and slavery ended, each county is to have a superintendent, what they call a county criminal court, to do the whipping and administer the correction for the whole county. They are to be tried before jurors; they are to be convicted of these offenses upon the testimony of witnesses; but those witnesses and those jurors are to depend for their compensation upon the liberality of the county commissioners in the county which administers this justice.

Another bill declares—

"That whenever in the criminal laws of this State, heretofore enacted, the punishment of the offense is limited to fine and imprisonment, or to fine or imprisonment, there shall be superadded as an alternative, the punishment of standing in the pillory for one hour, or whipping, not exceeding thirty-nine stripes on the bare back, or both, at the discretion of the jury."

Now, here are some of the offenses declared:

"That the severance from the freehold of any agricultural production or fixture, or any part thereof, and the felonious taking and carrying away the same, shall be deemed and held to be larceny, and be punished as such."

"That if any person shall excite an insurrection or sedition among any portion or class of the population of this State, or shall attempt by writing, speaking, or by any other means, to excite such insurrection or sedition, the person or persons so offending shall be deemed to be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall suffer death."

There are two provisions creating criminal offenses. One makes it larceny to cut a twig from an apple tree or from any other kind of tree and to carry it off. Removing anything of the kind from anything which is a fixture upon the soil is larceny. The next section makes it an offense punishable with death to incite insurrection or sedition among any portion or class of the population. That is an excellent law. That is a law which ought to have existed there a great many years ago. That is a law which ought to be enacted by the Congress of the United States this very session for the government of the people of the United States. That is a law which if it had existed a few years ago and had been executed would have saved the people of the United States from the horrors of this war through which we have waded, and would have sent to the gallows most, if not all, the men who propose this sort of legislation for the government of the freed population of Florida at the present time.

"Wherever fines are imposed as penalties, standing in the pillory and whipping may be substituted," the commissioners propose; why? They explain in this report. They say it will not do to degrade white men by punishment; it makes bad citizens of them, therefore you must not make them stand in the pillory, you must not whip them; but it will not do to rest upon fines as a punishment for the colored population, because they are poor, a great many of them, and they cannot pay these fines, and therefore it only punishes the State, it only punishes the county; it does not punish the colored individual or freedman. That is the argument; so that, in addition to imposing fines which are to be collected from their estates, if they have any, and which, if they have not, are to be collected by selling their services at auction to the highest bidder, there is superadded the provision that if the fine cannot be collected in either of these modes, they may be put in the pillory or be whipped. How are these penalties graduated? The eighth section of this bill declares—

"That if any person shall, in the night time, break and enter into any house or building, not the subject of burglary, or shall, in the day time, break and enter into any mansion or other house, with intent to commit a felony, he shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, and imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by standing in the pillory for one hour, or by whipping, not exceeding thirty-nine stripes, or by both whipping and standing in the pillory, at the discretion of the jury."

A thousand dollars! That sells a negro for his life. It will take him his lifetime to work out that thousand dollars. The tenth section declares—

"That every trespass upon the property of another, committed with a malicious and mischievous intent, the punishment for which is not provided by law, shall be deemed and held to be an act of 'malicious mischief,' and the party guilty of the same, his aiders and abettors, shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, and imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by standing in the pillory for one hour, or by whipping, not exceeding thirty-nine stripes, or by both whipping and standing in the pillory, at the discretion of the jury."

Going across a piece of pasture ground, traveling through a forest belonging to an individual, cutting a twig from a standing tree, anything which amounts to a trespass willfully done may be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, which fine may be collected by selling the services of the man until he can work out the fine; and yet we are told this community has given up its whole cause, surrendered everything, and is only providing for the peace of the community and its good order. Here is another provision:

"That if any negro, mulatto, or other person of color shall intrude himself into any religious or other public assembly of white persons, or into any railroad car or other public vehicle set apart for the exclusive accommodation of white people, he shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be sentenced to stand in the pillory for one hour, or be whipped not exceeding thirty-nine stripes, or both, at the discretion of the jury."

Recollect that this county criminal court is given jurisdiction of all offenses against religion, charity, morality, and decency. Provide this court for the punishment of offenses against religion, and then by this other chapter in the same code close the houses of worship against the admission of the negro; make him submit to the precepts of religion and deny to him all religious instruction; that is the effect of the two provisions standing together!

Another bill is to be entitled, "An act in relation to the contracts of persons of color." It provides that contracts are to be in writing, and—

"That when any person of color shall enter into a contract as aforesaid, to serve as a laborer for a year, or any other specified term, on any farm or plantation in this State, if he shall refuse or neglect to perform the stipulations of his contract by willful disobedience of orders, wanton impudence, or disrespect to his employer or his authorized agent, failure or refusal to perform the work assigned to him, idleness, or abandonment of the premises or the employment of the party with whom the contract was made, he or she shall be liable, upon the complaint of his employer, or his agent, made under oath before any justice of the peace of the county, to be arrested and tried before the criminal court of the county, and upon conviction shall be subject to all the pains and penalties prescribed for the punishment of vagrancy."

Recollect, Mr. President, these are laws provided for the control of a population made free by your laws, but who we are told are very ignorant and degraded and debased. They say they must have the right to make contracts for their labor, and here is a tribunal created for the express purpose of not only making these parties specifically perform the contracts, but of enforcing personal respect toward the employer and the agent of the employer on the part of these ignorant and degraded men during the term for which the contract is made.

The county court is to make ignorance respectful, to punish men who have never been taught what is respect or what is the want of it, for any disrespect, for a breach of good manners, for a want of politeness; to punish the lowest class of population, they say, that exists on this continent. This is the sort of legislation proposed in that district of Florida which we are told is the farthest advanced in the way of repentance and reconstruction.

Mr. President, I cannot weary the Senate with reading more from these provisions. The whole ten chapters are crowded with instruction and crowded with admonition. Here are ten chapters proposed for the government of this freed population in the district of Florida, bristling with penalties for all manner of conduct, from burglary and robbery down to a breach of politeness and of etiquette! The most of the penalties, as I have before remarked, are limited to a fine of $1,000. Every such penalty involves a sale of the delinquent for his whole life, for it could not be worked out short of his whole life. Now, sir, what kind of men are these for whose government and guidance and control these most formidable provisions are made? Are they really savages, barbarians, men plunging into all sorts of excesses, men whose hands are raised against the well-being of society and against every interest of society? Are these the men? I will tell you what kind of men they are, and I read it from the report of the same commission which has framed these bills. They say:

"Where, in all the records of the past, does history present such an instance of steadfast devotion, unwavering attachment and constancy, as was exhibited by the slaves of the South throughout the fearful contest that has just ended? The country invaded, homes desolated, the master absent in the army, or forced to seek safety in flight, and to leave the mistress and her helpless infants unprotected, with every incitement to insubordination and insurrection, to rapine and murder; no instance of desertion, and scarcely one of voluntary desertion, has been recorded. This constancy and faithfulness on the part of the late slaves, while it has astonished Europe and stamped with falsehood the ravings of the heartless abolitionists, will forever commend them to the kindness and forbearance of their former masters."

This is the way they are commended to the kindness and forbearance of their former masters. Laws enacted which punish criminally a man who does not take his hat off at the right time; laws providing to punish a freeman who is guilty of whatever a county criminal court shall call an act of disrespect!

"They [the masters] will do all in their power to promote his welfare, and to encourage and secure his moral and mental improvement."

Such as shutting up the houses of worship against him, and forbidding him to enter on pain of being arraigned and tried before the county criminal court.

"While they confine him to his appropriate sphere of social and political inferiority, they will endeavor to stimulate him to all legitimate efforts at advancement, and by the exercise of kindness and justice toward him, teach him to value and appreciate the new condition in which he is placed."

I do not like the school at which they propose to place him!

"If, after all, their honest efforts shall prove unavailing, and this four millions of the human family, but recently dragged up from barbarism, and through the influence of southern masters elevated to the status of Christian men and women, shall be doomed by the inscrutable behest of a mysterious Providence to follow in the footsteps of the fast-fading aborigines of this continent; and when the last man of the race shall be standing upon the crumbling brink of a people's grave, it will be some compensation to the descendants of the southern master to catch the grateful and benignant recognition of this representative man, as he points his withered finger to the author of his ruin and exclaims, 'Thou didst it.'"

These provisions, from which I have read to you some extracts, are provided not for the guidance and control of savages and barbarians; they are provided for the control of men whom this very commission boast have been elevated to the status of Christian men and women; they are the ones who are to be excluded from the houses of worship; they are the ones who are to be punished criminally if they do not exhibit every mark of respect to their employer, or to his authorized agent, which the county criminal court thinks is due from a colored man to a man who is not colored!

Mr. President, I am occupying too much time. The naked truth, the palpable truth, is—we must not shut our eyes to it—these men have not surrendered their cause. This committee memorializing the committee on reconstruction tell the truth when they say the sentiments and opinions and purposes of that people are unchanged. We must therefore furnish protection for this class of population and for that other class of their population to which I alluded the other day, the class which is not black but which is almost equally as unfortunate by reason of having been loyal. Sir, it was but a few days since that a lady whom I know to be a daughter of a man formerly a resident of Charleston, South Carolina, and whose name is known and honored throughout the whole Union where loyalty is honored, told me that soon after the bombardment of Fort Sumter she had to leave Charleston because of her known devotion to the flag of the nation. During her absence her whole estate, which was in the hands of trustees, was sold for a sum utterly inadequate to its purchase, and the price paid in the money of that confederate government which was not recognized as a valid government either by the United States of America or by any Government in the known world; and we propose to leave all such cases of confiscation in fact—for that is a case of confiscation—unredressed, to recognize the existence of these political organizations which are in the hands of the very class of men enacting and enforcing such laws as I have just instanced. Nay, Mr. President, it is an act of criminal disregard to both the men we have made free and to the men we commanded to be loyal, which this Government cannot venture upon with safety to itself.

However much we may declaim about the sanctity of the States and about the greatness of the Government resulting from the States, I must conclude by asserting what I said before, that I estimate the greatness of this country not by the number of organized States within it, but by the number of people obedient to its command. When, therefore, gentlemen meet me with the assertion that there are thirty-six or forty-six States in the Union, I answer them by saying that I stand on the proposition that there are thirty million people in the Union. It is for us and not for them to say whether they shall be organized into thirty-six or fifty-six or seventy-six States.

The Senator from Maryland insisted the other day that we must not recognize the possibility of the people of a State destroying their own government, because one State after another might do it until there was but one State left, and that, he assumes, would be an unconstitutional condition of things. Sir, I deny it. It is entirely within the limits of possibility that thirty-five out of thirty-six States might enact ordinances of secession, might put their local authority into the hands of tribunals sworn, as were the agents of South Carolina and of Mississippi, not to uphold the Constitution of the United States, but to resist it, and still there be a vast majority of the people of the United States loyal to the flag and obedient to the Union. There would be but one community, in my judgment, which could elect Senators and Representatives to Congress in that contingency; but I stand here and say that if there was but one State, if the State of Rhode Island alone was the only political organization which had a Legislature sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, Rhode Island could send two Senators here and two Representatives to the other House, and she would rightfully command the allegiance, and her laws would demand the obedience, of every citizen within the United States; and it does by no manner of means follow that she would not be able to enforce the authority of the United States. It does by no manner of means follow that there would not be a number of loyal people, in spite of the action of their local government, in each of the States which would rally around the flag and enforce obedience to its laws.

Mr. President, I have stated as well as I could the reasons which induce me to believe most firmly that if we recommit the powers of the States to those people to-day, the rights and the dearest interests of these two classes of men, one of which we have made free and the other of which we have found loyal, will be utterly disregarded and trampled upon. I conclude by saying that the Congress of the United States, if it means to secure loyalty hereafter, or if it means to secure respect for its supremacy or for its laws hereafter, must not and cannot restore the functions of States to those people until they have secured ample and complete guarantees that the rights, the political rights, of both these classes of people shall be respected. I submit this resolution with these remarks and hope it will go to the committee on reconstruction.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator has not answered my question yet.

Mr. HOWE. Excuse me. The question was, what shall we do with the governments that already exist in those districts?

Mr. STEWART. The organizations that have been formed under the sanction of the President since the fall of the rebel armies.

Mr. HOWE. If we conclude to organize provisional governments for those people, it seems to me to result necessarily that the organizations lately created by the people of those districts will have to follow in the footsteps of those organizations which existed there at the time the rebellion surrendered its arms. They represent precisely the same people, precisely the same constituency; substantially the Legislatures and Governors were elected by the same people. The President of the United States said to the Governors and the Legislatures which existed there in April last, "You must retire; pass aside, you are disloyal." For some reason or other he said to them "Step aside." The same people who elected those Governors and those Legislatures have, for some reason, and under the permission of somebody, elected Governors and Legislatures again. If we say after all that these people have not been restored and cannot be restored now to the right to choose Legislatures and Governors, these Governors and these Legislatures, these political organizations, must pass away with the former ones, and for precisely the same reason.

They are no more loyal themselves in the main. Individuals may be more loyal, but as a body they are no more loyal and represent no more loyal constituency than those which existed there in April. But on the contrary, if we say they are States, give them all the rights of States. I do not object particularly to the individuals who it is said are to be sent here as Senators and Representatives, or who it is said are elected Governors and members of their Legislatures. I have no doubt they are a great deal better than many you will see from there for a good many years after you recognize these organizations; but on the other hand, I do not care to say that they are any worse than a great many whom we hold eligible to office in the northern States; that is, they would be eligible if they could get the people to vote for them. I do not hold that the men who made this war and fought in it against the Government of the United States are any worse than the men who in our own communities at home have kept out of both our armies and theirs, but who have given all their prayers and all their encouragement and all their sympathies to the men who have been fighting against us. Their purpose was the same. One was just as disloyal to the Government of the nation as the other. One was a little bolder than the other; that is the only difference.

Sir, I put it to you, which of all those miscreants who went out to capture Jesus do you think was really the most criminal? Were they who went out with swords and staves in their hands, avowing their purpose and clamoring for the life of the Saviour, or was it that sneaking fellow who went out in the garb of a friend and undertook to betray the Saviour of the world with a kiss? I say it was not the servants of the high priest, but it was Judas himself. And among all those men who have sought to betray the authority of the nation I say those are the guiltiest who have not avowed their purpose, but have gone as directly and as persistently toward it under the cover of false pretensions of loyalty.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask another question. Until what period would the Senator hold them under territorial subjection—till what circumstances happened?

Mr. HOWE. I will tell my friend just how long: until the Representatives of the American people in the Congress of the United States who have demonstrated their fitness to take order for the welfare of the United States shall determine that they will do justice by each other and obey the laws of the United States; and when Congress comes to that conclusion, then do what you have done with all other people in a territorial condition, organize State governments for them and treat them as State governments; not hold them up one day and knock them down the next.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is not my purpose to continue the debate. I rise merely with a view to ask a question of the honorable member from Wisconsin. I understood him as admitting that the acts of Congress and the acts of the President to which I adverted, the acts of legislation and the acts of the Senate in its appointing power, are all very strong to show that the States are in the Union. I understood him to say that they were in the Union because of the existing legislation, and that all he proposed to do was to change the existing legislation by this resolution of his. I understood him to say he had voted for the admission of the Senators from Arkansas, and that he would have voted for the admission of the Senators from Louisiana. What I want to know of the honorable member is this: if the Senate had concurred with him and had admitted the members from those States to their seats and they were now here, does he think there would be any power in Congress to legislate them out by passing a law to govern the States of which they were the Representatives upon this floor as Territories? It is true that some of the States, the new States, are in the Union by legislation; but if they are in and they are represented on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the other House, by the Senate and the House deciding that they were properly elected, I am at a loss to conceive how by legislation they could be expelled. If, therefore, the honorable member's opinion as to the rights of those Senators had been the opinion of the Senate, and they were now upon the floor, here they would remain, representing the States whose representatives they purported to be, unless there is vested in the Senate of the United States by the Constitution an authority to expel by legislation a Senator upon this floor upon the ground that his State is not a member of the Union, although it had decided that fact by admitting him to his seat.

Mr. STEWART. I think the Senator from Wisconsin has made an argument in favor of the legislation under consideration, but not a very strong argument in favor of his own resolution. He tells us that there is disorganization in the South. We expected it. He tells us that they are proposing legislation which makes an unjust and odious discrimination between the whites and blacks. We were aware of that fact. We expected it. But why complain of them for this legislation when we have now by the constitutional amendment the power to legislate on the subject, and when it is our duty to do so? We have a bill under consideration which will cure nearly all the evils of which the gentleman complains. It provides that the courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of all cases arising under that provision of the Constitution which abolishes slavery, and which confers upon Congress the power to carry into execution that article of the Constitution. This clearly makes it the duty of Congress to provide for the case, and Congress has assumed this duty in other like cases. No case existed before where there were so strong reasons for the action of Congress. The fugitive-slave clause of the Constitution was carried into effect by the courts of the United States without any provision in the Constitution that Congress should legislate on the subject. The Constitution simply provided that the States should deliver up fugitives from labor and fugitives from justice, and it was settled that under that clause the courts could take jurisdiction of their delivery when Congress had passed an act for that purpose, and here is a bill simply adopting that machinery and applying it to the case of the freedmen.

If there are in the South laws that reenslave the negro, we are passing laws to abrogate them; we can sweep them all out of existence. I do not suppose there is a Senator upon our side of the House who doubts the power of Congress to protect the negroes under the constitutional amendment that has been already adopted. Then, I say, that if we do our duty under that provision, the fact that those States have laws hostile to our institutions is no argument in favor of reducing them to a territorial condition. If we have the complete power to protect loyal men, to execute the laws in favor of freedmen, to abrogate all laws making them slaves or degrading or oppressing them, why not act by doing our duty and passing laws that shall secure these ends?

Then, having done that, what else do we want to accomplish? We all want them to be States as soon as possible. Will it be taking a step forward to destroy the little of organization they have accomplished? You say these organizations are hostile to the negro. Very well; suppose they are, they have no power to carry into effect any laws hostile to the negro, because that is taken out of their hands and put in the power of the General Government. The fact that they are not treating the negro right is no argument in favor of destroying their organizations, inasmuch as we have complete power over them so far as that question is concerned. What is the object of destroying them? If they can do no harm, the Senator has furnished no argument for their destruction by showing that they do not protect the negro.

What is the remaining argument for their destruction? That they were created without authority of law. Suppose that to be the fact, still they are organizations gotten up by the people; and if they can be matured into States, why not let them alone? You may say that they send men to Congress who are hostile to the Government of the United States, rebels, traitors, to represent them. Have we not power to keep such men out? Have we not a test oath that will keep them out? Is it not our duty to exercise a right of discrimination under this test oath, so as to encourage Union men? Why not discriminate between those who are hostile and those who are loyal? The effect of such a course will be to strengthen your friends in the South; but pass laws making no discrimination, treat them all as hostile to the Government, act upon the supposition that we have no friends at the South, and we shall have no friends. We have no more friends there now than we need; they are in a sorry condition; we have very few friends in that country, and they have very little power; but a sweeping law that shall treat them all as aliens will never give us more friends. If we can protect the loyal men by the arms of the United States legitimately in carrying out the provisions of the constitutional amendment, (because the President has a right to execute the laws, and to call out the forces of the United States to execute them if they are resisted,) and can at the same time secure the rights of the freedmen, ought we not to be satisfied? Why not so act now that we shall be at liberty in all our future action to discriminate between the loyal and the disloyal? If you destroy the existing organizations entirely and build up new ones of your own, ignoring the fact that there are any loyal men there, when will you have those States back in the Union? I ask this as a practical question.

I understand that among those sent here by the southern States to represent them there are some loyal men, at least one or two. There are loyal men there, and they will be encouraged by our admitting the loyal men who have been sent here. You have power to keep disloyal men out of these Halls; and why not exercise it? What is the use of tearing down that which has already been done? When you have torn it down, there are not two Senators on this floor who agree as to what shall be built up in its place. We differ as much among ourselves as to the manner of building up, as any of us do with the President in regard to what he has done. I say, let us not pull down, but let us sustain what we can; let us hold fast to that which is good. To protect the southern loyal men, to protect the freedmen under the authorized power of the Constitution is our first and paramount duty. Let us do that; let us extend the hand of fellowship to the loyal men whom we may find in the South, and who will help us to sustain the Constitution and the Union and to enforce the laws; and then we shall have done something toward a practical restoration; but if we continue here as we are, each man presenting daily his own plan no two agreeing as to what ought to be done, one pulling down what another tries to build up, it will be very long before the South will be reconstructed to suit us.

Now, I am opposed to tearing down; I am in favor of holding fast to what we have that is good. We have been legislating for a few days in the right direction toward reconstruction, and let me say to the Democrats on the other side of the House that I do not think their opposition to these measures is calculated to advance reconstruction, because it is impossible ever to receive into these Halls any men from the South unless they come from States where law and order prevail.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will my honorable friend allow me to make one remark as he has mentioned Democrats? I do not know a Democrat in the length and breadth of this whole land who believes in the doctrine of reconstruction. They do not admit the propriety of that term. Our fathers constructed the States for us, and they remain as our fathers constructed them.

Mr. STEWART. I am not here to discuss terms. You may call it "restoration," or you may call it "reconstruction;" you may call it one thing or another. The fact exists that we have had a war. The fact exists that while we had that war the southern States were not acting in harmony with the Union. The fact exists that we want to get them back in harmony. These are plain facts. The fact now exists that we have amended the Constitution, and that under it we are empowered to keep order in the South and protect the freedmen while this process of restoration is going on. These are plain facts, and I say to the Democrats on the other side of the House that they retard reconstruction when they ask that we shall withhold military power from the South and allow anarchy and disorder to prevail there; because, no matter whether they are States in the Union or out of the Union, their representatives cannot be received in Congress unless they come from States where law and order prevail. The war must have been entirely concluded, we must have peace and order there before they can again act in harmony with us. These measures are calculated to give that peace and order; and I flatter myself that the great mass of the southern people, the best of them, are in favor of peace and order; but they are powerless to restore it. It must be restored and held there, until society shall settle, by the strong arm of the Government. Let us do this; let us save the organizations that are already provided; and then we can commence discriminating in favor of loyal men at the South who will work for the glory of the whole nation, who will stand by us as good and true men. There are some such there, and however few they may be they ought to be encouraged. We can in that way give them a nucleus about which to rally, and we can make some progress during this session.

This seems to me to be the practical way of reconstructing. It matters not whether these organizations were legally started or not, they exist there. What good will it do us to tear them down? Have we not control there for all practical purposes to preserve order as fully and as completely as we should have if we reduced them to a territorial condition and passed elaborate laws for them? Can we not keep order there now? Is it not our duty to do it? Is it not the duty of the President of the United States, through the military, to see that the laws of the United States are executed and enforced? Can we not then accomplish all that is necessary for the peace and security of that portion of the country without destroying that which has been done?

If we can build up without tearing down let us do it, and then we shall have no difference of opinion, then we can all agree. I think we should allow these organizations to stand; and when a man comes here who has been tried in the fire of war in the South and is truly loyal to the Union, ready to take your test oath, ready to work with us for the restoration of the country; the State from which he comes being protected by the strong arm of the Government; the freedman being protected in all his rights by the laws you pass under a Constitution which is ordained for his freedom, will it hurt us, will it lower the dignity of this body to admit on this floor a truly loyal man from the South?

I think that the voice of one or two loyal men from the South, if we could get them here, would not only aid us but would be an advantage to the southern people; it would be a warning to them as to what they must do; it would be a guide by which they might be conducted; it would be a rallying point around which a Union sentiment might be created in the South. But if we treat them all with contempt, if we do not seek to build up the solid foundations of States, but spend this session in tearing down what has been done, we shall adjourn without having accomplished any good result. We must reconstruct at some time. To hold these States permanently in the condition of Territories is out of the question. You cannot do it. That course would be contrary to the genius of our institutions. The people of the North are opposed to it; the people of the South are opposed to it. When you admit that you cannot have a Union, when you admit that you have exhausted all your powers and that there is no hope of a Union of States, the North will rebel against using military power to hold conquered provinces, and you cannot get armies for that purpose. Sir, we should never give up the idea that we can have a Union. Whether we like the southern people or not, we have got to try the experiment of fellowship with them, and that before a great while. I would rather have fellowship with those who have been loyal than with the mass of the disloyal; but under the system of territorial organizations, I do not see that we can have any kind of fellowship either with the loyal or disloyal. In this view of the question, I am in favor of continuing in the course we have commenced, passing these bills, going on, as I consider, in this work of practical reconstruction.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to inquire what has become of the bill that was the order of the day at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill was laid aside by common consent to enable the Senator from Wisconsin to go on with his speech; and a subsequent discussion has arisen in consequence of inquiries made by the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Nevada explanatory, as the Chair understood, of something that the Senator from Wisconsin had said. No objection having been interposed, the Chair did not arrest the discussion. The bill properly before the Senate is the bill which was the unfinished business yesterday, and which was then taken up on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. STEWART. I understood that that bill was before the Senate when I spoke.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is Senate bill No. 61. That being before the Senate, I propose—

Mr. HOWE. I ask my friend to allow this resolution of mine to be referred.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection, if it can be done without debate.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we had better refer this resolution. I have never known a discussion prolonged before on a mere question of reference. This resolution has been discussed day after day on a mere question of reference; let it be now referred to the committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes; let us get rid of it.

Mr. McDUGALL. The objection to its going to a committee is one which I think ought to be understood on both sides of the House. It is not a proper subject of reference to a joint committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If my friend from California will give way, I will move an executive session, and that will dispose of the matter this evening. There is executive business that requires attention.

Mr. McDUGALL. I give way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Senate bill No. 61 being up, and being left as the unfinished business, I move an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and, after some time devoted to the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 26, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. UPSON, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the contested election in the sixteenth district of Pennsylvania, concluding with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Alexander H. Coffroth, upon the certificate and papers relating to the election in the sixteenth congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania, has a prima facie right to the vacant seat from that district, and is entitled to take the oath of office and occupy a seat in this House as a Representative in Congress from said district without prejudice to the right of William H. Koontz, claiming to have been duly elected thereto, to contest his right to said seat upon the merits.

Resolved, That William H. Koontz, desiring to contest the right of Hon. Alexander H. Coffroth to a seat in this House as a Representative from the sixteenth district of the State of Pennsylvania, be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon said Coffroth within fifteen days after the passage of this resolution a particular statement of the grounds of said contest, and that said Coffroth be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon said Koontz his answer thereto within fifteen days thereafter, and that both parties be allowed sixty days next after the service of said answer to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denials, notice of intention to examine witnesses to be given to the opposite party at least five days before their examination, but neither party to give notice of taking testimony within less than five days between the close of taking it at one place and its commencement at another, but in all other respects in the manner prescribed in the act of February 19, 1851.

The report was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PAINE. I rise to a question of privilege, and present a written statement of the views of the minority of the Committee of Elections on the same case. I ask that the first resolution reported by the minority be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That William H. Koontz has the prima facie right to a seat in this House as a Representative from the sixteenth congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The report, with the accompanying resolutions, will be laid upon the table, and be printed.

COMMUNICATION WITH MONTANA AND IDAHO.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the development of the gold-producing regions of the country is of the utmost importance to the financial success of the nation; and whereas communication between the northern tier of States and the gold fields of Idaho and Montana is now possible only by a long detour to the southward as far as St. Louis: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of directing the Secretary of War, by bill or otherwise, to establish a line of military posts from the western boundary of Minnesota to the Territories of Montana and Idaho by the most direct and advantageous route, and to facilitate communication along said route by the construction of a military road with proper bridges over the water-courses.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. HENDERSON for one week.

DRAWBACKS UPON EXPORTS.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas a practice has recently grown up along our northern and northwestern frontier of exporting merchandise to the British Provinces, obtaining a drawback of duties paid on the same, and creating deposits of such goods at convenient places along the line, whence they are smuggled back into the United States, to the great detriment of our revenue:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of reviving the law of 1799, which provided that no drawback should be allowed upon articles exported to any foreign State immediately adjoining the United States.

MESSENGERS FOR HOUSE POST OFFICE.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Postmaster of the House of Representatives be allowed two additional messengers for the term of two months, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of seventy-five dollars each per month.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If that will give us our mails a little earlier in the morning, I will agree to it.

Mr. STEVENS. The Postmaster of the House says that the pressure of business is so great that unless additional assistance be given him he will not be able to accommodate members with their mails as early even as he now does.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the adoption of this resolution be necessary for that purpose, I certainly shall not object, because I think we ought to receive our mails at least an hour earlier every morning.

Mr. ROLLINS. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House.

LIGHT-HOUSES ON NEW JERSEY COAST.

Mr. NEWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be requested to inquire into the necessity of repairing and relighting the light-house on Tucker's Beach, on the coast of New Jersey, and also of erecting a light-house at Mattawan Point, on the Raritan bay; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

WILLIAM H. GODDARD.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of William H. Goddard, for compensation for services rendered the Government, for the payment of which there is no provision; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to report a rule prohibiting the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives for any other purpose than the legitimate business of Congress.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I will do so.

CLOSE OF THE DEBATE.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky has called for the regular order of business. If there be no objection I will now make an announcement in regard to the joint resolution in reference to the basis of representation.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House, if there be no good reason for postponing it longer, that I will call for a vote on the pending special order on Monday next after the morning hour. The debate will then have run for a week. It seems to me that that should be regarded as reasonable time for debate; and I hope that the House will then be ready to come to a vote.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the gentleman to permit me to make a suggestion.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Several members who have arranged to go, to-night or in the morning, from the city, to remain over Sunday, will not be able to be here on Monday after the morning hour. I mention that for the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman to make it Tuesday after the morning hour.

Mr. STEVENS. In that view I will say that debate shall be closed on Monday, and that the vote shall be taken on Tuesday after the morning hour.

Mr. SCHENCK. I make another suggestion, that the joint resolution and amendments that have been proposed, together with the instructions accompanying motions to recommit, be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MESSENGERS FOR HOUSE POST OFFICE—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] withdraws his objection to the resolution for the appointment of two additional messengers of the House post office, provided that it be referred to the Committee of Accounts, to which I have no objection.

The resolution was received and referred accordingly.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the consideration of the following joint resolution reported by the joint committee on reconstruction:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring.) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE.—Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. LE BOND to refer the joint resolution and pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon which Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELIOT. I understand there has been no understanding in reference to the vote on this proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated he will ask for a vote on Tuesday, after the morning hour, and that the debate shall be closed on Monday.

Mr. ELIOT. There is already a special order for Tuesday, after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The pending joint resolution is the special order until disposed of.

Mr. ELIOT. What becomes of my special order?

The SPEAKER. It will come up in its regular order.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the country as a general thing has been deceived and misled in regard to the troublesome and vexed question of the negro. The great mass of the people labored under the delusive impression that when slavery was removed or destroyed all strife between the North and the South would disappear. They were everywhere told that slavery was the cause of the rebellion and the strife between the North and South; remove that and all strife would cease. Hence, they were naturally inclined to believe that the removal or destruction of slavery would put an end to all this strife. I have never believed so for a single moment. Slavery was but one phase, one development of the negro question.

Slavery is gone, but the negro question comes back on us with redoubled force.

The Republican party have manufactured a large amount of capital out of the negro question. First they began with caution, now they draw on it as if they thought it as inexhaustible as were the widow's barrel of meal and cruse of oil. The fact that the negro question has continued so long has been owing to the great care with which the Republican party has managed it. When the question of emancipation of the slaves was before the country the Republican party began with extreme caution. When slaves were emancipated in the District of Columbia, they disclaimed all power and right to interfere with slavery in the States, alleging that the charge against them was a slander, and appealing to their Chicago convention platform.

That accomplished, however, is but one step. What is the next? Then slavery is stricken down in all the Territories, and the compromises of the past revolutionized. What next? The President had said that he had no lawful power to interfere with slavery in the States. His Secretary, by his authority, had said that any effort on the part of the President in that direction would be so manifestly unconstitutional that it would be arrested by the courts, even though Congress and the people might assent to it. What is to be done then? Upon consultation a fiction was devised. The Constitution prohibited all interference; the war power was resorted to, and upon that fiction war was made upon slavery in the rebellious States. Well, what next? What shall be done with the stubborn, unyielding, perverse State of Kentucky, and some of the other border States? You cannot apply the war power to that institution in Kentucky, because she has not been in rebellion. That State stood under the old flag and contended for her rights in the Union. What was to be done then? Why, we will strike down slavery in the Union; we will strike at Kentucky, under the old flag and in the Union. And hence, before the war was over an amendment to the Constitution was passed, passed right in the middle of this struggle.

Now, does any sober man in his senses believe that if the whole purpose of the Republican party had then been disclosed it would not have revolutionized that party? It is said that consistency is a jewel; but honesty, frankness, and open, fair dealing is a far brighter and more precious one. But something at least has been gained. The Republican party now stands openly committed before the whole country in favor of unrestricted universal negro voting and negro office-holding. However much that has been disguised and denied it can no longer be concealed. Why, sir, during the elections that took place last year, even in my own State and district, I with many others foresaw what was coming; yet you could not impress it upon the people. And even those in Kentucky who had gone off and joined themselves to the abolition party denied that there was any such purpose on the part of any except a few fanatics in the North. People could nowhere be made to believe that there was any purpose of universal political negro equality. But now the question is made here on negro suffrage, precisely as it was on negro slavery in the District of Columbia. You have voted universal negro suffrage for the whole mass of that population in the District, and you have opened the way to them to become office-holders.

In view of the various propositions now before the House the same purpose is manifested and sought to be carried out universally. Who will deny any longer that it is the purpose of the controlling majority of the Republican party to carry out universally negro suffrage throughout the whole country? It was denied everywhere; no Republican dared for a moment to take that position a few years ago. But now you are before the country on that issue. It was denied even in the late election for Governor in Ohio, but now the party is compelled to come out and assume the position.

Now, sir, in the hands of these skillful manipulators, I know not how many Protean shapes this negro question can yet be made to assume. I suppose when universal negro suffrage is carried, then negro homesteads and intermarriage between negroes and whites will be encouraged so far as law will encourage it. That will be the next step. But now we know what the proposition is. This provision is sought to be fastened upon the whole country by a constitutional amendment.

It is the first time in the history of this country that any party deliberately set about for the purpose of ingrafting upon the organic law of the land their own peculiar political dogmas. What are we met with here now? No less than seventy amendments to the Constitution. And if there were an amendment for every time that instrument has been violated, perhaps twice seventy would not meet the demand. But seventy amendments! Where do they all come from? Every one comes from the Republican party. What does that show in regard to the loyalty of this party?

Now, I do not hold the Republican party responsible as a party for the extreme utterances of some brainless demagogues in the North—those who desire, as they said, an anti-slavery Constitution, an anti-slavery Bible, and yet another term more profane than that; nor do I hold them as a party responsible for that other utterance, that our old Constitution was "a covenant with death and a league with hell." I do not hold the party responsible for that, but I do hold them responsible for their own work here in Congress. But, sir, what do these seventy amendments show in regard to the loyalty of the party? What is loyalty under our former Government? Is it not to be true and faithful to the Constitution; to support and defend it? Does it not mean that, no more and no less?

What was the crime of the South? What constituted them traitors at the commencement of our troubles? Was it not that they rose up, rebelled, made war upon the Constitution as it then was? That was disloyalty then. To support the Constitution was loyalty, not to support it disloyalty. Now, these seventy amendments coming from that party even before the struggle is yet over, one carried in the middle of the war, might be considered by men a little censorious as showing that the Republican party at the North is about as much opposed to the Constitution as the southern rebels were. Some men might say so; I do not say it. Now, the Democratic party and the majority of the people of Kentucky have always been loyal, according to the true definition of the term, because in my State a majority of the people from first to last struggled to sustain the old form of government. When the question of loyalty turned on sustaining the Constitution, then the voice of Kentucky was for the old Constitution, and amid the storm and tempest of war, high up above the storm, the voice of Kentucky rung out at every period for the Constitution as it was; and yet her loyalty is called in question.

Now, were you in the North, your leading politicians, satisfied with the Constitution? How happened it, then, that before the war was over there was an attempt to change it? Why is it that you attempt to force back these States but will not let them come back to the Government they left? How does it happen that there are seventy amendments pending, all of them coming from that party?

Suppose a religious teacher, however loud his professions of piety might be, should undertake to sustain by argument that there are seventy well-founded objections to the Bible, some men might think his orthodoxy a little questionable. But suppose he goes on, professing all the time to be a devoted Christian and to love his Bible, and manufactures objections until he has more than one for every page of that sacred old volume, no charity would restrain us from pronouncing that man an infidel of the deepest dye. How it is here? There are twenty-three pages of the Constitution, and we have seventy amendments already—more than an average of three amendments for every page! And yet that is the "loyal" party par excellence.

Now, as to amending the Constitution, I do not know but that in time, when all passion subsides, and men are cool enough to rise above the passions of the hour and look over the whole country in all its sections, and look forward to the wants and happiness of posterity, some amendments may properly come up, such as this: that Rhode Island, for example, with two Representatives, shall not have the same power in the Senate that New York has, with thirty-one Representatives; and then, again, that when the election of President devolves on Congress, as it probably will, and perhaps very frequently, it may be thought that it is not in accordance with our republican form of government for Rhode Island, with two Representatives, to count as much as New York, with thirty-one Representatives, in the election of President by Congress. Some of these changes may come up in time. While it is not my business to admonish good, loyal Rhode Island, yet it might be well for Rhode Island and some other of those States in the East to keep a little near shore, and not go out too far in this experiment of making changes in the Constitution.

Now, I appeal to every man who hears me if the work of Constitution making and Constitution amending is not one of the very things that require, not only the calmest deliberation, but the highest order of patriotism. It needs men who will rise up above the feverish political issues of the day, trample them under foot as unworthy a moment's consideration, and look with the eye of the patriot and statesman over the whole country, embracing in their liberal view every section and every interest of the country for all time to come.

But, sir, among these seventy amendments, every one that my attention has been called to is a miserable scrap of party stuff. The one now under consideration has no higher object in view than a mere sectional advantage to strike down and weaken the representative power of Kentucky and the other southern States; or, instead of that, we are to have the negroes enfranchised, so that they will hold the balance of power and secure the control of the States to the Republican party. It is a measure not to affect the men of the North, but to come down with considerable effect upon the border States. It is wholly, entirely, intensely sectional and partisan, and every man knows it.

Now, I propose to call attention to the record this Republican party has made on this very question. It is time that a little posting was done, so as to bring together and compare the different pages of record this party has made. At the time when the emancipation question was up, and when everything else was kept behind the curtain, and that development of the negro question only presented, it was denied everywhere that anything else was to come afterward.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman; but I wish to make a correction of an error into which he appears to have fallen.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I will yield to the gentleman with great pleasure, if it is consented that it is not to come out of my little time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not wish to take up the time of the gentleman, and I hope that the few moments I may occupy may not be taken from his time. The gentleman has repeated a statement which I have seen several times, that there are seventy propositions before the two Houses of Congress to amend the Constitution. That is an error. I understand that there are only twenty in this House and eight in the Senate, and those all relating to but three or four subjects.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Well, sir, I think I have counted more than the gentleman has mentioned. I made the statement on the authority of a statement made the other day in the Senate and not contradicted. But it is very certain that the way they are multiplying day by day their name will be legion very soon.

Now, sir, I propose to look to the record of this party a little, and I will be glad to have gentlemen listen to me. When emancipation was the question, and everything else was ignored, the presses of the North teemed, and it rang out here in these Halls day by day and week after week, that the slaves of the South were degraded, degraded in body and mind, exceedingly ignorant, but little above the level of the beasts of the field; and that degradation and ignorance was declared to be in consequence of slavery. Every man knows that that was the voice that rang out here in this Hall for weeks and months; that that representation was universally made through all the anti-slavery presses, who declared that slavery was "the sum of all villainies." And why? Because it debased and degraded to the lowest depths of ignorance the slave. Every man knows very well that that was so. One phase only of the negro question was then presented.

Now, when the negro suffrage bill for the District of Columbia was to be passed, what did we hear from this same party? Why, that the slaves have ample capacity and were qualified and intelligent enough not only to take care of themselves, but to receive a part of the sovereign power of this Government; capable of exercising judiciously the political franchise; capable of taking their full share in the political power and in the rule of this Government. That was the spirit of the bill you passed. It says to the whole country that you believe that these slaves, contrabands and all, who have swarmed here, are qualified now, though but yesterday released from slavery, to exercise that most important privilege under our form of Government, the elective franchise. You impart to them a part of the sovereignty of this country; you give them equal power in political control and rule; you allow them to aid in directing and controlling this complex but beautiful machinery of government. Every man knows this.

Now the question I have to ask is simply this: when you were striving to emancipate the negro, and represented everywhere that the slaves were degraded almost to the level of the brutes of the field, sunk into the lowest depths of ignorance, did you believe it? If you believed that then, you did not and do not believe what you said in favor of the passage of the negro suffrage bill in the District of Columbia, because you urged in favor of that bill, as you do in this proposed amendment of the Constitution, but more especially when you passed that bill giving universal suffrage in this District, that the negroes can be safely intrusted with an equal participation in the Government, and are intelligent enough and sufficiently qualified to take part in the control of the Government. Do you believe this? If you do, then you did not and could not believe what you said on the emancipation question. Or if you believed that, then you do not and cannot believe what you said on the suffrage question. In other words, if that which you then said in regard to the ignorance and debasement of the negro when you proposed to emancipate him was true, then it follows that what you have lately said in regard to their qualification for the exercise of the elective franchise was false. Or, if what you said lately in regard to their qualifications to exercise the elective franchise was true, then what you said on the emancipation question was false. That is, if this is true, that was false; if that was true, this is false; and there is no escape from it.

I contend that this whole movement of Constitution amending is intensely partisan. I ask my Republican friends this question: if the slaves are qualified to exercise the political sovereignty of this country, where, in what school, were they qualified? Do we not all know that they were brought here as savages from that dark and benighted land of savage cruelty where superstition, crime, and bloodshed reign? If they are now fit to be your equals in controlling this Government, where were they schooled? Why, sir, the schooling they got was under southern masters. You now turn pro-slavery advocates and utter a stronger doctrine in favor of the system of slavery than ever was uttered by any man in the South. Now, I inquire again, whether you believe that the Africans of the South were so degraded and ignorant as you represented, and whether you now believe that they are intelligent and qualified to exercise the elective franchise? Did you believe either? Is it not a doubtful compliment to the acknowledged intelligence of that party to suppose that they believed either?

But, again, to come a little nearer to the present time, and to come to a matter that is fresh within the recollection of every man. A few days ago these Halls rang with declamation to show that the negro is qualified to take part in the Government equally with the white man, and that no distinction ought to remain between them. I know that there are here a few noble, independent, honest Republicans who rose above their party and refused to follow party lead on that occasion; but almost two thirds of the members of this House declared by their votes that the negroes, the whole mass of contrabands here in the District, are well qualified to exercise the elective franchise, to take part in the political power and government of this country. Did you believe that?

What do we see next? When the bill for the Freedmen's Bureau is presented, you represent the negro as utterly helpless—a child, and not fit to take care of himself; and upon the theory of his helplessness and ignorance this Freedmen's Bureau is professedly based; the negro must have a guardian, and must be treated as an infant in all respects; so far from his being fit to take part in the Government, he cannot govern himself; he cannot make a contract for a week's work; everything in regard to him must be controlled by the Freedmen's Bureau or its agents. Now, does any man in his senses believe both these propositions? One or the other is necessarily false. It is impossible for the same set of men to believe both propositions; and this party did not and could not.

What next? Why, we all know that there are in various States a large number of intelligent young white men between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one years, many of whom have fought your battles. Another portion of the people is composed of tax-paying widows, and strong-minded unmarried white ladies, and your wives and daughters. These are all disfranchised; but the negroes are all enfranchised. Now, what is the logic of your action here? It declares that these young men, these widows, these unmarried ladies, these wives and daughters have less intelligence, less qualification for taking part in the Government than the negroes; that it will be more dangerous to intrust them with the elective franchise than to confide that privilege to the contrabands of the South. That is what you say by the logic of your action. But do you believe it? There is not one single man here that believes it in his heart or believes a word of it.

Then, again, does any man believe that it is necessary for the comfort and happiness of the freedman that he shall be made a voter and an office-holder? Will it benefit him, make his condition better? You say so. Do you believe it? Then why deny this precious boon to your widows, your young sons, and your wives and daughters? Are they not "bone of your bone, and flesh of your flesh?" or has the fell spirit of fanaticism intervened between you and your own race and color, and divorced you from the "white man's Government" and the white race, so that, like the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] it shocks your sensibility even to hear this called the "white man's Government?"

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Not here; presently, when I get through.

Why, sir, when a member talks here about this being a "white man's Government" he is gravely rebuked. Now, the way you are going on, I admit you are changing and coloring this Government right fast. [Laughter.] But I say it was a "white man's Government," once, I know; and as a "white man's Government" it had my first love—a love even stronger than woman's love.

It was a white man's Government. What it will be by and by I know not.

At the time the negro suffrage bill for the District of Columbia was under discussion, a stranger coming into this Hall and looking into the galleries might have thought, seeing them full of negroes, that this was not a white man's Government. At an early hour they rushed into the galleries, ousted and kept out white men and white ladies. Who could blame them? They had heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] denounce the sentiment that this was a white man's Government. They took the hint, got possession first, and held it; and in doing so were they not following your example? They took the galleries just as you have taken this House; you got in first and took possession of this Hall, and when the members from Tennessee and other States came you closed the doors upon them.

Mr. KELLEY. Let me say a word.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Not just now.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman has asked a question which I want an opportunity to answer.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Presently. Now, Mr. Speaker, from these few hasty remarks, I ask every gentleman whether it is not plain and palpable that this whole strife and agitation in regard to negro suffrage is not because any man seriously believes he has the capacity and qualification for its exercise, nor is in any sense to benefit him. It is intended for your benefit, not his—all to subserve your party purposes. It is evident that the whole thing is for the purpose of making party capital by converting the whole negro population into voters, under the idea that they will all vote with the Republican party, and so give them the balance of power in the southern States. Is not that the truth?

Let us apply another test. If we could satisfy this House and this Congress that the negroes, when enfranchised, would vote the Democratic ticket, it would kill this amendment at once, and silence every Republican voice. I ask if there is a single man among you who would vote for negro suffrage if he believed the negroes would vote the Democratic ticket? Not one, and you know it. You support this amendment because you believe you can control the negro vote. The amendment itself is a piece of groveling, miserable, party patch-work.

It is in that spirit the Constitution is approached by the Republican party. I would myself scorn to approach that sacred instrument to amend or change it in any respect, for any sectional or party purpose whatever. No man is fit to touch it unless he can rise above party, shake off party trammels, look over the whole country, and take in and provide for the interest and wants of all sections. Sir, when gentlemen approach a question so grave and serious as that of amending the Constitution, they ought to feel that "the ground is holy" and "take off their shoes." At such a time all party feelings, and party purposes should stand abashed and rebuked.

But I contend that party advantage is the whole object of all the proposed amendments to the Constitution. They are the result of party feeling. There is not one which has not some sectional party end. The amendment under consideration is the first fruit of the celebrated reconstruction committee. It opens the door, and we can see all that is behind. What do we find to be your plan and purpose? To keep out the Representatives of the States who are as much entitled to their seats as the President is to his seat. In that way you expect to get a two-thirds vote to ingraft on the Constitution your political dogmas. You act upon the ground that, to be perfectly safe and secure in power yourselves, it is necessary to keep the southern States out of power, and that is the time and occasion fixed on to do this party work. It is monstrous!

After our Constitution was formed, and Washington and other great and good men had retired from their labor, they looked into the future, and with almost prophetic vision saw that sectional parties and party spirit were the great dangers to which the Government was exposed. How faithfully they warned us against these dangers. But how fearful and terrible has been the bloody strife into which this country has been plunged by not regarding those earnest and solemn warnings. And yet, right in the face of all this, it is attempted now and here to manufacture a sectional, party Constitution, providing for certain sections at the expense of others, and at a time when those sections, at whose expense this is to be done, are not allowed to be here; when the doors are purposely closed against them to keep them out until you fix up a Republican party platform and make it a part of the Constitution.

Now, sir, is this fair? I appeal to the honest candor of Republican gentlemen, is this fair? And does any man in his sober senses fail to see that you are now sowing broadcast the seeds of revolution. If you shall, by excluding eleven States, make a Constitution for them without their consent, and attempt to force it upon them, may not that come home to plague you in the next generation? Are you sure you will yourselves be satisfied with it? The way to preserve this Government is to let every man feel its blessings. Let it be like the sun of heaven, to warm and cheer every section alike. Let every man feel that it protects himself, his family, his home, and all that he has, and then he is ready to die for it, if necessary. But if a section, a mere part, shall usurp authority and control of the Government, and exclude all others, making oppressive amendments for the mere purpose of sectional advantage, it is, I say, sowing broadcast the very seeds of rebellion. No man can foresee the results of these measures in the changing fortunes of this country.

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Directly; not now. You are preparing by this amendment to strike Kentucky another blow. You propose to force her to adopt negro suffrage or lose a part of her representation on this floor. But in the ever-changing population of this country many of your children and grand children may in a few years be citizens of Kentucky, where they will reap the fruits of this denial of her rights; so fanatical and blind are all schemes for making sectional and party constitutions in a country like this. Why, sir, to obtain a sectional advantage in this way is a thing I would not accept; I would scorn it. Seize upon this Government, exclude eleven States, make a Constitution that is to operate upon them and their posterity for all time, and not allow them to be heard! Sir, that is provocation enough. If they had had that much provocation before the war, they would have been justified in the eyes of the world in the attempt to throw off such oppression by revolution; they would then have been right. It would be a greater provocation even than our fathers had who rebelled against the Government of Great Britain. You propose to frame and pass an organic law without their consent or participation, to force it upon them, and to tax them without representation.

Sir, allow me to illustrate this course of action. Suppose three northern men unite and form a partnership in a certain business. Each brings in all his capital. They are all equal partners. By and by one is absent. His two partners close the doors of the house and change the articles of partnership so as to allow him less capital in the concern and increase their own. When he returns they say to him, "We will open the doors, you can come in and resume business with us, provided you will agree to and ratify the article of copartnership as it now reads; but if you will not agree to that, we have possession and will keep you out altogether." Now, sir, would not common honesty blush at such a transaction as that? But yet, sir, is this any better? Do not two thirds of the States take possession of this House, close the doors upon the other third, seek to change the Constitution, so as to greatly increase and enlarge their own powers, and diminish the powers and rights of the other third, proposing to force such a Constitution upon them or keep them out altogether? Does not every gentleman see that all such propositions to amend the Constitution rise no higher than the miserable party issues of the day? You seek in the absence of those eleven States to hedge, fence around, and secure yourselves in political power. And how vain are all such attempts! You may prepare the way for a rebellion which may reach you by and by as well as Kentucky and other border States. If you go on in this way, sowing the seeds of revolution, you may yet reap a fearful harvest for yourselves in the North. It is well to look now to the future. You are attempting to manufacture a new Constitution, closing the door against eleven States, knowing that if they were here you could not do it. Therefore you keep them out.

And then when it comes to the ratification of this amendment you deny them a voice in the ratification. For if I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] he proposes this amendment for ratification to nineteen of the States only.

Sir, you are proposing to intermeddle with the most vital question that pertains to our Government. Sovereignty resides in the people. Every man who is a voter exercises a part of that sovereignty. There is nothing more vital. Our whole machinery of Government is put in motion only by it. The sovereign, the voter, approaches the polls, touches a spring, and instantly the whole complex machinery is in motion.

The power of the elective franchise is unquestionably the most important power than you can confer upon any one. It is the basis and foundation of our system of Government. If this machinery is put in motion and started carefully and cautiously in the right direction, the happiest results follow; but if it is started in the wrong direction, who can count the consequences? And yet you have said in some of your bills, and now you propose to say to the whole country, that this degraded African race, as you once represented them, ignorant almost as the beasts of the field, can be safely intrusted with this important governing power. No man can believe that it is safe. To say the very best of it, it is an experiment, and more than that, our form of government is yet an experiment. Many of our best and wisest men yet tremble for its fate, and the history of the whole world so far is against man's capacity for self-government. We are now on trial, trying an experiment. We have had one terrible collision, and we ought to guard, especially in our constitutional amendments, against a recurrence of it at a time when the great problem of man's capacity for self-government is not yet solved, and the eyes of all the friends of liberty throughout the world are intently gazing at this experiment. You come up rudely now and propose to take into full governing partnership with yourselves millions of a most degraded and ignorant race. How was it that we got along thus far? How was the war carried on? Was there any voice of this sort to be heard at that time? Your orators then were haranguing their countrymen to rally to the standard to defend the Constitution. You all know now that if this phase of the negro question had then been presented, your standard would have been deserted; not a man would have come to it. I make no appeals to the soldiers. Some of them are very good men; they are much like other men. But I ask you if this is to be the result of the war. Is there not some reason for saying that this Republican party designed and intended all this from the start; that they intended to go on and on and emancipate the negro and then enfranchise him and make him the equal of white men, and in that way perpetuate their power?

Although I do not say it, yet pardon me for believing it. Was it for this that this crushing public debt has been accumulated; a debt that is absolutely reducing the poor white man to the worst of slavery, the slavery of grinding and oppressive taxation; a debt under which this great nation now reels and staggers like a drunken man? Was it for this that our brave soldiers were called to the field, and thousands of them sacrificed their lives? Is this the result of all their sufferings on the field of battle, of all their toils and wounds and bloodshed and sacrifices—that they should enjoy the precious privilege of being made the equal of the negro at the polls and in office-holding? Yes, that is all.

Now, sir, although we of Kentucky are considered in the Union, and loyal enough at least to be here and to be occasionally heard, I would not if it were in my power take advantage of the feeblest State in the North improperly and unfairly to reduce her representation in this body, and more especially would I blush at the idea of doing it when her mouth was closed and she had no voice here. You of the North are not to be affected by this provision, as your negroes are few, but you know very well that the tendency of your emancipation policy was to turn the tide of negro immigration to the South. We are to have a dense negro population who are unfit to control themselves as you say; there must be a Freedmen's Bureau to control them. You want to force us in Kentucky, for example, either to enfranchise all these negroes or give up part of our representation. Is that fair? Is it just?

Now, I apprehend the fairest basis of representation is the one we now have, population. Perhaps a suffrage basis would be more nearly fair than any other amendment you propose; but I am satisfied with it as it is. I do not know that a suffrage basis would be exactly fair to the New England States. I do not know but that some of the New England States that have an excess of female population might be injuriously affected by it. Convince me of that, and I would not consent to it as an amendment to the Constitution.

Sir, this is not open, fair political warfare. You are proposing to take advantage of the absence of the Representatives of eleven States and the feeble power of the minority here to ingraft your peculiar political dogmas on the Constitution. Have you not done enough of this sort of work?

Did not Kentucky bare her breast to the storm, and do her whole duty in the war? Were not her fields desolated and her whole territory ravaged by the war? That she could not escape. It was the misfortune of her geographical position, and she could not help it. But in addition to all that, you passed an amendment to the Constitution which struck down at one blow at least one hundred millions in value of property, recognized up to that time everywhere as property, without a dollar of compensation ever promised. That property was legalized and recognized as much as any other property; and men, in making provision for their families, made large investments in that kind of property; yet, by that one act, you strike down that vast amount of property, absolutely robbing the infant in the cradle and the tottering old widow on the verge of the grave, and thousands who owned no other property. But you said it was necessary, and that was the ground upon which it was placed, that it was necessary to enable the Government to succeed against the rebellion.

Now, while Kentucky has made all these other sacrifices, was it fair and honest to take from her one hundred millions of her property for the benefit of the whole of the States, and pay her nothing? I would not accept that from Massachusetts or from any other State, even though it was necessary for the good of the whole nation to take any species of property from Massachusetts or any other State. I could not be driven by the party lash to do it without giving just compensation. The principle of common honesty would forbid it. I would not live myself upon the means of another man, nor would I be in favor of supporting and sustaining the Government at the unequal expense of the States.

Mr. McKEE obtained the floor.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I have but a few words more to say.

Mr. McKEE. I move that my colleague [Mr. HARDING] have his time extended until he can conclude his remarks. How much time does my colleague want?

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I want only ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. McKEE. I move that his time be extended for fifteen minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Now, sir, as I am noticing the condition of affairs in Kentucky, I beg the attention of gentlemen while I present the matter in some other lights. Even the little pittance promised by your law of $300 for each slave of a loyal owner who volunteered has been virtually repudiated as you all know. And I do not expect it will be paid, not a dollar of it, and I do not care about it for myself. But I am speaking of what is fair and just. Property to the amount of thousands and millions has been taken and used by the Federal Army, indeed by the two armies as they passed to and fro over the State. Even those claims for property, horses, and provisions, taken from loyal men by our Army have been refused, though they made their claims out by full proof, their loyalty backed by an oath to support the Constitution, and to my knowledge claims of that sort have been sent back with a condition requiring the claimant to take an additional oath to support the emancipation policy. For the first time in the history of the world have honest, loyal men been required to swear to support a particular political policy or forfeit and lose their just claims.

Now, you have taken this property, in the form of slaves, because you said it was necessary for the common benefit; that the good of the nation required the sacrifice. But did it require that Kentucky should sacrifice one hundred millions of property for your benefit? Was it right or just that you should place such a burden as that upon a State already oppressed by the consequences of the war, and refuse to bear a portion of it yourself? Surely, all must see its palpable injustice.

And now here is another proposition. You are not satisfied with striking down this large amount of our property in Kentucky; you want to force upon her negro political equality, or you will rob her of a part of her representation in Congress. You will never succeed in doing that. Have we not sustained losses enough already? Was it not enough that we should be exposed to all the calamities of the war, and then to lose one hundred millions of property? Was not that enough?

And is this proposed for the benefit of the negro? You know it is not. If you believe that it is, there is a way in which you can prove your belief. We will never enfranchise the negro in Kentucky. If you believe it is for the benefit of the negro, then open your doors in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and give the negro there the right to vote, and we will pay their expenses and help them on their way there. If there was any honest purpose to benefit the poor downtrodden freedmen, there would be some provision made for them in the northern States; some proposition to take them there and provide for them. Before they were freed there were enough to be found along our borders ready to help our negroes off North by means of the underground railroad. Why not help them off now they are free? Now, sir, that will not do.

There is another and an intensely selfish purpose in view. You know the strong local attachment of the negro. You know that while he has heretofore gone North, his home has been in Kentucky and other southern States. There were the scenes of his childhood's memories, there are his relations, and you know that the consequence will be to turn the tide of negro immigration southward. Now, is there any man here who will rise above these miserable shackles of party and passion, like a statesman and patriot, and look over this whole great country, run his eye far down the stream of time, and anticipate and provide for the wants of coming generations? Is there any man of that character here in favor of this amendment? How refreshing it would be to see some such character and spirit as was exhibited in the old Convention that framed the Constitution. How this horde of Constitution makers would be rebuked.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Not now.

Mr. KELLEY. I then rise to a question of order. I do not wish to make the point of order on the gentleman which I might well make by calling attention to the fact that he is not addressing the Chair, but continually addressing gentlemen on this side of the House, and making personal appeals to them by question. I ask leave simply to submit a single question to him, as he promised I might do it by and by.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] must, by the rules of the House, address his remarks to the Chair. But he has the right to decline to yield to any member while he is speaking.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will not interrupt me, he will not call my attention from the Speaker.

I was about to say how very refreshing and inspiring it would be if some such spirit as that which animated the great and good men who formed the Constitution should suddenly make its appearance here. How these little Constitution amenders would all be abashed and retire overcome with shame! Those men of the constitutional era were statesmen and patriots in the true sense of the term. They were men from whose breasts the refining fires of the Revolution had removed all dross. They rose above every merely sectional consideration. They strove to guard against sectionalism. They looked to the interests of all parts of the country, not simply for the time being, but for all time to come. Does any one see here any tokens of a similar lofty spirit? I submit that all these present attempts at Constitution amending are strikingly sectional and intensely partisan. The whole of these seventy amendments are miserable batches of party stuff which a pure patriot and a true man, like the men of 1787, would spurn from him with contempt and trample under his feet.

Now, sir, it is the idlest thing in the world for men to suppose that they can carry out an experiment like this, when a party having seized on the reins of power, usurping all authority here to the exclusion of eleven States of this Union, attempt by amendments to the Constitution to ingraft their political dogmas into the framework of this Government. Is there any member here who would not feel it to be rank injustice if his own State should be treated in this way? These attempts to inaugurate a system of negro equality are eminently calculated to sow the seeds of revolution. I predicted long since—and gentlemen here will live to realize the truth of the prediction—that whenever the abolition of slavery should be accomplished you would find tenfold more elements of revolution in the free negro question than ever were found in the slave question. You may press on in your attempts; but no party can succeed in bringing up the negro to a level with the white man. So long as this system of negro equality is enforced by the military power, you may hold up the negro beyond his natural position; but whenever that power is withdrawn, as some day it must be—when the white man is once more allowed to stand on his feet, the negro will take his appropriate place below him. This will be the result at last, in defiance of all your legislation and all your constitutional amendments. Nature has made the white man the superior of the negro; and that superiority will eventually assert itself, in spite of all your efforts to crush down the white man to a level with the negro.

Look at what you have exhibited in connection with the Freedmen's Bureau. A vast army of Federal office-holders are to be spread all over the southern States, sustained by a standing army of something like one hundred and fifty thousand men—a vast military establishment in time of peace. Meantime the public debt is growing larger and larger; taxation is becoming heavier and heavier. By and by, at the rate you are now moving, you will bankrupt this nation, or at least bring upon us a fearful financial crisis. We are now rapidly approaching it. Instead of economy in the expenditure of public money, I see nothing but evidences of extravagance everywhere around us. An enormous military establishment is to be kept up for the purpose of caring for, schooling, and maintaining the negroes, so that they may vote the abolition or Republican ticket in the South. This system is merely a change of masters. Under the Freedmen's Bureau, the negroes are virtually reenslaved. The adventurers from the North, who have the control of that bureau, are many of them actuated by the most selfish and avaricious motives; and they seek to make fortunes for themselves through the agency of the Freedmen's Bureau.

We can see how the system will work. These agents of the Freedmen's Bureau will get possession of the abandoned and confiscated lands and control the labor of the slaves: so that the unfortunate Africans will be swindled out of their earnings and substantially reenslaved by those who hope to make fortunes by the cultivation of those rich lands.

But, sir, I will detain the House no longer. I know that my argument will have but little weight or influence on the determined purpose of that party. There is only one argument that will move them. Satisfy them that when the negroes are enfranchised they will vote for the Democratic party, and the joint resolution will be at once voted down. You know it. Ought not then such amendments to the Constitution to be stamped with the contempt of the people; ought they not to be consigned to infamy?

I will now hear any question that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may desire to put to me.

Mr. KELLEY. When the gentleman was appealing personally to us on this side of the House to know why we did not give suffrage to those soldiers, between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one, who fought our battles, and to tax-paying widows, and the strong-minded maidens of the country, as his appeal seemed to each gentleman personally, I wanted to ask him whether he was in favor of giving suffrage to the three classes he designated. And I assure him, if he introduces a bill for that purpose, it will not want my earnest support. I tell him that whenever he introduces a bill to enfranchise—

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I will go on.

Mr. KELLEY. I have the floor.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I only yielded for a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKEE obtained the floor.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I ask my colleague to yield to me to respond to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McKEE. If my colleague will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to ask a question, I will give him two minutes to make a response.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. That is very liberal indeed; I will take it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I beg the gentleman to yield to me for one minute to answer the question put by his colleague.

Mr. McKEE. I yield to the gentleman for one minute, and to my colleague two minutes to reply. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman had had the courtesy to yield when he was upon the floor he would have had plenty of time to reply.

When he reproached us with seducing from the border States their laborers, or, as he calls them, negroes, he said that their relations were all there; and I wanted to ask him then whether their relations would not still be there in great numbers even if we took every negro out of Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I will answer the gentleman's other question first. He says that if I will introduce a bill to confer the right of suffrage upon the strong-minded women of this country he will join me. I am most happy to find that his sympathies are not all entirely locked up with the negroes. He is now as liberal as Mr. Beecher was the other night. After that clergyman had discussed the question in favor of negro suffrage at great length—I saw it before he came to it—he said that the white women had some claims; that they came next to the negroes, [laughter;] that the white women of the country were almost as good as the negroes. [Renewed laughter.] Their claims are postponed, but next to those of the negroes.

Now, when has the voice of my friend been heard appealing for the tax-paying widows? No, his voice has always been for the negro. When was his voice raised for giving the right of suffrage to the young men who had fought the battles of the country? You are the Constitution makers. We are satisfied with the Government. We are loyal men. You undertake to tamper with the Constitution, and when was your voice heard for any but the negro? Now, for one, I say that I would prefer the white women and the young men I have referred to to the negro. I infinitely prefer giving them the right of suffrage. I am fonder of them than the negro.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, I do not know but the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. HARDING,] as I have not my own written, will not throw me off somewhat from the course I intended to pursue. I did expect to have heard my colleague enlighten this House, as I know he has the capacity, on the question before it. I regret extremely that he has pursued the same line of policy that gentlemen belonging to the same political party have pursued ever since the idea took possession of the Government that the negro was to be a freeman. His whole speech has been made up of the negro and nothing else.

He assumed that position—that the Republican party on this side of the House seemed to have but one idea, and that was to legislate in favor of the negro. Sir, if there is more than one idea in the remarks of the gentleman I have failed to see it, and that idea seems to be to cling to that old black carcass of slavery so long as the Democratic party can make capital out of it by bringing it before the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe the gentlemen on this side of the House, all those who have stood by, upheld, and maintained the honor and integrity of our country during the gigantic war that has swept over the land, all agree, now that slavery has been swept away, that the basis of representation upon which it has existed heretofore needs amendment. I assume it as a fact that the gentlemen of the Republican party, that party which has stood by and upheld the flag of our country against armed treason, now hold the doctrine that the Constitution needs amendment. They may differ in regard to what that amendment shall be. It is reasonable that they should, and I am gratified that we have had so much discussion, so many points of difference argued before the people, that we may more easily, and as sensible men, be able to come at the facts, and ascertain what we need.

Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen on the other side of the House have held the doctrine through the whole war, and they still hold it—they have maintained the old idea that the Constitution framed by the fathers was good enough for all time, and for eternity, if we could run into that. I believe that the fathers of this country and framers of this Constitution intended and expected that that instrument would need amendment as our country progressed. Had they not held to that, they would not have put that fifth article in it, which provides for amendment and so distinctly points to it. In the face of that opinion of our fathers, and of the most distinguished writers upon constitutional law, including Justice Story, who so clearly sets forth that in time amendment will be needed from the changed circumstances of our country, the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House contend that we must stick to that old instrument. And they go a little further than that. They say that all amendment is revolutionary; that it is a usurpation. Look at the record of that party through this great struggle which has ended in the triumph of our arms. What measure that has been proposed by the party on this side of the House, from the time the first gun was fired on our forts at Charleston has not been denounced as unconstitutional and a usurpation? That has been the whole course of that party. They opposed the levying of war. They said we had no right to call out troops to crush armed treason. And now, at the end of the war, we are met with the declaration that it is a usurpation to attempt to amend the Constitution without letting those rebellious people be heard on this floor. Why is it that they are not heard? Who sent them from these Halls? Of their own accord they went out, one by one, State by State. They rose in their seats, put on their hats, and walked from this Capitol in disgust. They wanted no part in the legislation of the nation. They said they never would come back. And now, at the end of the struggle, when their treason has been crushed and ground to powder, their apologists on this floor say it is a usurpation to legislate because the voices of those rebels are not heard here.

I thank God they are not heard in this Hall. They have no right here to be heard. We all remember when they had their cannon marshaled on the heights above this city threatening the destruction of all that was here. And yet, according to the theory of the gentlemen on the other side, their rights are all the same to-day. I do not desire to see the day when armed traitors, or men who upheld the rebellion not armed, can come back here and have the same rights that I and you and the men who upheld the banner of our country in the field have.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know that the amendment now before the House as reported by the chairman of the committee is all that I would desire. I do not know that it satisfies even that honorable gentleman himself altogether. But I believe that it is the best thing they could do, and if I can get nothing else I intend to vote for that. My idea is this: that in regard to those States lately in rebellion, the tendency of things seems to be that they are to be represented here at an early day; that the men whose hands are yet dripping with treason, stained with the blood of the soldiers of our country, are to come back here and be participants in carrying on this Government. I hope that tendency may be arrested. But I say the tendency appears to be that way; and if it is consummated, and they do come back, I want them to have just as small a representation as this House can give.

I would like it if the amendment could go a little beyond what it does. I would like so to amend the Constitution that no man who had raised his hand against the flag should ever be allowed to participate in any of the affairs of this Government. But it is not probable that we can go that far. Let us go just as far as we can.

Gentlemen say that they are not willing to vote for an amendment that strikes off a part of the representation of the States; they are not willing to vote for an amendment that lessens Kentucky's representation upon this floor. The whole course of my colleague's remarks on this point is as the course of his party—and I may say of the loyal party in Kentucky—has been through a great part of the war, that Kentucky is the nation, and the United States a secondary appendage to her.

Now, sir, if Kentucky in the future is to have such Representatives, a majority of them, as she has had during the last two years of this eventful struggle, and as the majority of her delegation here to-day, let us have just as few as possible of that kind. That is my argument upon that point. In my own State, during the whirl of excitement, and when we were supported by the Army of the United States, we did pass a law by which we disfranchised men who had gone into the rebellion; but when the storm swept over, when the conflict of arms ceased, the Legislature reënf franchised them, and the distinction there now is, not against traitors, but against men who have upheld the flag of our country.

You may say to me that my people in Kentucky will not indorse the cutting down of her representation here. I care not what my people indorse. Convince me that I am right—and you cannot convince me that I am wrong when I go against traitors—and I will go upon that line whether one, two, or one thousand stand by me in the State of Kentucky. I am not Kentucky's Representative upon this floor alone; I thank my God I take a wider survey of the field of my country than is wrapped up within the bounds of my own State, by her mountains and rivers; I thank my God that my eye looks out over the whole broad expanse of our land, from Maine to California, and from the northern lakes to the everglades of the South. I want to legislate for the whole land, and not for one part of it only. It is a narrow-minded view of the subject to say, "I will not go for this proposition because New England will lose two or three Representatives; I will not go for this proposition because California or the Northwest will come in for a larger share of the spoils, or because my own State will suffer." Let us consider if it is for the good of our whole country, and act upon that theory. There are men in this House who have a little more faith in the honesty, integrity, wisdom, and uprightness of that class of men who rebelled than even I possess, coming from southern soil. I must say, Mr. Speaker, in the light of events, that it has not developed itself yet to my mind that these people are in a fit condition to be represented here by a large representation, if at all.

Right here I would make one remark which may not be pertinent, and which some of my brethren may differ with me in regard to, and it is simply this: as I have said, I should like to go away back and strike at the root of this thing, and prevent all traitors from participating in the affairs of this Government. There was a time when we could have carried this doctrine out and no one would have grumbled at it. I fear that time has passed. I hope, however, that we may come back to it, because I believe, sir, that if we do not come back to that doctrine, in less than four years more we will be troubled by another war. The time to which I refer was when, before the great clash of our armies in front of Petersburg and Richmond, the rebel hosts succumbed to the power of the Federal arms and Lee surrendered, followed immediately by the collapse of the whole concern. Then we could have done anything. They were willing to accept any terms. All that the leaders expected was that they would be hung, or at most allowed to leave our shores in peace; and that was all they ought to have had. The great mass of their followers simply expected that they would be allowed to return to their homes and there enjoy in peace and quiet the proceeds of their labor, with us to make the laws by which they were to be governed.

But, sir, in my judgment, a mistake was committed; when Sherman and Johnston met in North Carolina, and made the treaty, there I think the trouble began. I hold a paper in my hand containing it. It is familiar to all, and I need not read it. But that treaty reëstablished the rebel States in power, and set in motion the machinery that existed there all the time upon their taking the oath of allegiance; and there the trouble began. What was the result? The conference between Johnston and Sherman terminated on the 15th of April, 1865; and an abstract of the terms agreed upon was forwarded to Washington as early as possible; and immediately afterward, on the 21st of April, the President of the United States, just a short time after the assassination of that great man who had led us through the darkest hour, on the reception of that dispatch, called his Cabinet council together. And what was the result of their deliberations? At that council the action of General Sherman was disapproved by the President, disapproved by the Secretary of War, disapproved by General Grant, and by every member of the Cabinet.

Who approved that treaty? The whole anti-war party; the whole Democratic party; the whole party which had been all the time against the Government of the United States, and against forcing rebels and traitors to submit by our armed power. And there is where they got their encouragement. They said to themselves, "Here is a great party in the North who desire that we shall be reinstated, with all our rights and privileges just as they were before." They took courage, and it has gone on increasing. And gentlemen will excuse me when I say that I do not see the difference between the theory of that treaty of Sherman and Johnston and the present condition of the States as they exist in the South to-day. I may be wrong; but if I am I should like to have the difference pointed out to me by some distinguished gentleman upon this floor.

Now, I say that I favor this amendment as reported from the committee, because I believe it is the best thing that we can get adopted by the States. I do not care whether these men in the South ever allow the negro to vote or not. That is not a question about which I feel any concern at this time. I will, however, say here on that point, that whenever the negro develops sufficient capacity for all the rights of citizens, that he now has an opportunity to do, even my Democratic friends here will not be opposed to giving them to him. And I will say a word further in reply to a remark of my colleague, [Mr. HARDING.] He said, convince the Republican party that the negro will vote the Democratic ticket and they will drop this whole measure. I say, convince the Democratic party that the negro will vote their ticket, and they will crawl on their knees to drag him up. [Laughter.] But that is not the question here.

In my opinion, this amendment leaves that whole question just where I believe it ought to rest, exactly in the position where I have always contended in my short political career the question of suffrage should be, in the State itself. And since we cannot change that basis, which I believe we cannot do, let it remain there. This amendment leaves it there. And it rests entirely with them whether they enfranchise one race or another. On the general question of the suffrage for the negro I need make no explanation. My views are on record. I voted against the bill allowing negro suffrage in the District of Columbia. I did not believe then, nor do I believe now, that this race, coming immediately out of bondage, is fit for all the rights of citizens. When they develop sufficient fitness for that purpose I will be the last man to withhold the right of suffrage from them.

I am not afraid of social or political equality with any race, and I am sorry—yes, sir, I am sorry—that my learned and distinguished colleague [Mr. HARDING] and the gentlemen who act with him are so fearful on that score. I was always taught to believe that in this country, said to be free, we had the right to choose our own associates. I do not believe this amendment, if adopted, will take away that right. I think it will remain; and if any gentleman chooses to associate with a colored man, with a black man, or any other man or race of men, even the Hindoo or the Hottentot, he can do it. I believe in every man having the same show in this world for life, and when he develops all the capacities that fit men for the highest rights of citizenship, then let him have them.

Now, in regard to the proposition of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] I am opposed to it. I do not believe in basing representation upon actual voters, and without debating that question I will give a very short reason for my opposition to it. It will have a tendency to lead States to confer suffrage upon all, to enfranchise men from other lands the moment they drop on our shores, as some of the States do already. I think this matter of suffrage should be guarded. While I hold to the great doctrine of universal suffrage, let us extend it only so far as we can bear it. Therefore I oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

So far as concerns the great mass of amendments offered by gentlemen from the Republican party—of course no Democrat offers one, because he does not want the Constitution amended—I have paid but very little attention to them, because I have made up my mind that this one reported from the joint committee on reconstruction is the best for us to adopt.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The Democrats proposed many amendments to the Constitution just before the rebellion broke out.

Mr. McKEE. Yes, sir; and they voted for them, too, I believe. Gentlemen from my own State, then upon this floor, every one of them voted for an amendment to the Constitution proposed by Hon. Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky. But now it is all wrong to propose any amendment to the Constitution! I believe the whole Kentucky delegation voted for that proposition. I do not know who they were; but I venture to say that the same men, if they are living to-day, are in the Democratic party.

Mr. GRIDER. If any of the Kentucky delegation now on this floor voted for that amendment I trust my colleague will designate them.

Mr. McKEE. My immediate predecessor, Mr. WADSWORTH voted, I believe, for the amendment proposed by Mr. Crittenden.

Mr. GRIDER. Not a member from Kentucky now on this floor was here then.

Mr. McKEE. I did not say that such was the fact. I said that the Kentucky delegation then on the floor of this House, whoever they may have been, voted for the Crittenden amendment. They wanted to perpetuate the institution of slavery.

Mr. GRIDER. I understood my colleague to say that some of the Kentucky delegation now on this floor voted for that amendment.

Mr. McKEE. If I said that, I did not mean it.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to say that my colleague who now occupies the floor used the expression that the entire delegation then on this floor from Kentucky voted for that proposed amendment; which is true.

Mr. McKEE. That was my assertion.

Mr. SMITH. I desire only to add that the object of that amendment was to establish slavery forever in those States where it existed; it provided that there should never be any amendment to the Constitution prohibiting slavery. Now, I say that my colleague is correct in taking the position that those who are acting with that party to-day, and have opposed the abolition of slavery, and sanctioned the conduct of the rebels, are particeps criminis with them.

Mr. GRIDER. I understood my colleague to say that some of the Representatives from Kentucky now on this floor voted for the amendment to which he alludes, which was introduced, as I understand, by the honorable and distinguished John J. Crittenden. I only undertook to say that I did not believe that one single gentleman now here as a Representative from Kentucky was a member of this House at that particular period.

Mr. McKEE. I will ask my colleague one question: did he not at the time, and has he not since, approved that vote of the delegation from Kentucky?

Mr. GRIDER. I will answer the gentleman. This is the identical question which was put to me during my late canvass; and I met it by saying that, so far as I was concerned, in my district and my State, when this rebellion commenced, we took the ground that we were for the Constitution and the Union, and would maintain all our rights under the Constitution, under the stars and stripes, and that we would not tamper with that sacred instrument until the rebellion should have ended, and peace, with her soothing and kindly influence, prevail all over the land; and then, if the Constitution needed amendment, we would do it with deliberation and in a manner becoming statesmen. And that is what I say now.

Mr. WARD. That is what we are doing now.

Mr. McKEE. The gentlemen upon that side of the House have been calling out every day since the opening of this session that peace has now been restored to our land. Not a member on that side opens his mouth without giving utterance to the statement that peace is now restored to our land. Well, now that peace has come, let us go to work, in the language of my colleague, and amend the Constitution, so as to render this peace secure and enduring. Like statesmen let us proceed in our work, and strike out from the Constitution a provision which now has no appropriate place there, in consequence of the changed condition of circumstances.

Mr. GRIDER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McKEE. I will hear another question when my colleague shall have answered that which I have already propounded—whether he indorsed that vote of the Kentucky delegation?

Mr. GRIDER. I have indorsed nothing that happened before the rebellion commenced, [laughter,] because I was not in political life. I have stated my position fairly and distinctly; and now, if my colleague will permit me to ask him a question, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. McKEE. I decline to yield unless the gentleman answers my question.

Mr. GRIDER. I will answer it. But let me first ask him a question.

If peace has come at last, and now is the time to commence the amendment of the Constitution, why does he not let the whole of the States be represented, and to have a say in reference to those amendments.

Mr. McKEE. I am satisfied I have the gentleman exactly where I want him. [Laughter.] I am arguing from his position, and from the basis of gentlemen on that side of the House, that peace reigns. I occupy no such position; I do not think that peace reigns except by the armed power which enforces it. And while I hold that doctrine, I think that it is the right and duty of the men who have been sent up here to represent those who have stood by the Government in its darkest hour to make all needful laws, and even constitutional amendments, to keep a rebellious people in peace and security hereafter.

So far, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman's question goes, why I do not allow those States to come back and be participants upon this floor, I will say that they have not shown a loyal spirit to justify it. Tell me that the men down in the rebel States are loyal to the Government! Tell me that they are in a condition to come here and legislate for the benefit and good of this whole Union! Tell me that they are the men to legislate for the widows of soldiers, and for the soldiers who have been maimed for life! Tell me that they are fit to legislate for the great people who stood by the country! Do we not know that these lately rebellious States have elected and put into the highest offices men who are the most odious traitors? Do we not know that they are knocking at the doors of this Hall and asking for the admittance of men upon these floors whose hands are reeking with the blood of slain loyalists? I want none of them. I want none but loyal, brave men. Let them send to this House men who, under the most trying circumstances, stood by the country. Let them know in those States they must select men who never went into the rebellion. Let us have none here who committed treason. Let them place the power of the States in the hands of loyal, brave men, and reject these odious traitors, and I will be ready to receive them, but not until then.

Mr. GRIDER. How are you going to discriminate against such men as Maynard of Tennessee, and the men from Tennessee, Virginia, Louisiana, and other States, which States were represented here pending the rebellion?

Mr. McKEE. I will make a discrimination for myself; I do not do it for anybody else. I speak on my own responsibility. I will say in regard to the gentleman from Tennessee, who is seeking to be admitted to all the rights and privileges of this floor, that I believe him and others to be loyal men; but in two thirds of Tennessee I do not see a loyal people. I do not want to separate Tennessee. I do not think she wants to be divided. I do not want to separate East from West Tennessee; but I do wish to give a wholesome lesson so as to make the State in every part of it loyal. I should like to aid those gentlemen who periled their lives in Tennessee in defense of the country. I am disposed to see them come in.

Now I will ask my colleague a question. He desires the return of these States. Now, would he vote to receive the Representatives sent here from the State of South Carolina? Would he do it to-day?

Mr. GRIDER. Whenever any representation from any State reorganized, on the suggestion, as I understand, of the President, advisory in its nature, under the apportionment we passed pending the rebellion—

Mr. GARFIELD. Make him say yes or no about South Carolina.

Mr. GRIDER. I will take care of that without the gentleman's suggestion. I am one of those who are not afraid to say what they think. [Laughter.]

Now, let me answer my colleague. The President having in an advisory manner recommended the reconstruction of those States, if they come here, embracing South Carolina, under the apportionment bill fixing representation at the time the rebellion was raging for all the States—if Representatives came here and presented credentials that they were regularly elected, I say that we have no authority to exclude them from this Hall. If they are unworthy members, if they are what the gentleman says, rebels and traitors, and ought to be hung, when you get them here and have jurisdiction over them you might do what you please with them. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKEE. I decline to yield any further.

Mr. GRIDER. Let me finish my sentence.

Mr. McKEE. I am disposed to be very courteous.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. The gentlemen on the other side seem to be answering the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRIDER] by laughing. Is that in order?

Mr. GRIDER. I have no objection to gentlemen amusing themselves by laughing as loud as they please, so that they do not laugh while I am speaking. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will restrain gentlemen from applauding or exhibiting disturbance, but he certainly cannot prevent them from laughing. That is beyond the power of the Chair.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it in order for gentlemen to laugh so as to disturb gentlemen on the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not proper; but he certainly has not the power to prevent gentlemen from laughing.

Mr. GRIDER. I am sorry the point has been made. I am willing the gentlemen should laugh on the other side of the House, but I think they had better be weeping than laughing.

Now, sir, I will answer the gentleman's question whether I would admit South Carolina's members. I will act in my own official capacity here upon the credentials that are placed before me, if they are regular, from every State in this Union, where that State has, according to the advisory admonitions of the Executive of this Government, organized its State government and sent Representatives here. And I will risk the authority of this House and this country to manage them when they get here, if they are not right. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, I am exceedingly sorry my colleague does not answer the question, yes or no. He seems not to have learned that in Kentucky. In our State, we have always considered that other way of answering as peculiar to Yankees. The answers of my colleague to the interrogatories propounded to him by me would indicate that he belongs to that part of the country. I only hope he may advance and carry out the position he has put himself in the House, in replying in that way to the questions, by going on until he gets completely Yankeeized.

Mr. GRIDER. Too old for that. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKEE. Now, it appears to me the gentlemen on the other side of the House ignore altogether the great principles upon which our Government is founded, namely, that we are a Government by the people. They are afraid to trust the people on this great question which properly belongs to them—the amending of the Constitution. They dislike to put the subject before them. It shows a lack of confidence in the people. I have always been willing to trust the people of this country, and I am not afraid to put this issue before them now. I believe it best for the future security, peace, and happiness, that it should go to them. And in their wisdom and majesty let them act upon it.

Gentlemen talk a great deal about usurpation. Who is it that makes these usurpations? It is the Representatives in this Hall who are simply the exponents of the people at home, and when the people indorse our action, where is the usurpation? I am not afraid. The people will take care of that. Now, sir, why delay action? Why stop to inquire? Why beseech these men, who voluntarily left the Capitol, to come back here and aid us in fixing up and restoring the country? I believe that all men agree in this, that the great fabric of our institutions has been shaken. We have set out on a voyage, we have sailed smoothly, peacefully, quietly along the sea of progress. At last a great wave has swept over our ship and shaken some of her timbers, but, thank God, it has not destroyed her. Now what is the part of wisdom? What is the duty of the men who manage the ship of state? To trim her sails anew, and repair her weak points for the purpose of developing her strength, so as to be prepared for all future emergencies.

Mr. Speaker, I take this proposition that comes from the committee on reconstruction simply and only upon that basis; believing that it is the best thing, under all the circumstances, that we can do for the land at present; believing that it will be a more certain guarantee of peace, happiness, and security to our land that we are likely to get; and believing that it will do more than any measure we can secure to keep down the traitor power, and leave their influence in the councils of the nation too small to be felt.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that to-morrow, by order of the House, is to be devoted to making speeches on the President's message in Committee of the Whole, and no other business; and as it is necessary that the Chair should be absent, he will ask the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], who is chairman of the Committee of the Whole upon the President's annual message, to take the chair to-morrow as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, when this discussion commenced, it was not my purpose to take any part in it at all, and I do not now desire to be heard at length upon the main question now before the House; but, sir, there have been involved in this discussion some questions incidentally connected with the main question which, in my judgment, present considerations of importance quite equal, if not superior, to that of the main question itself, and it is mainly upon one or two of those questions that I desire, for a short time, the attention of the House.

I hold, Mr. Speaker, that some of the greatest dangers that surround free institutions, and some of the greatest dangers that lie in the pathway of the prosperity and happiness, the development and glory of our country, do not come in the shape of direct and tangible propositions; they do not come in direct and clear attacks, with uncovered hand and uncovered purpose, upon the policy or institutions of the country; but they come under the specious covering of construction, of constitutional interpretation; they come under the guise of attempts on the part of those administering the Government to give to the Constitution a new meaning or interpretation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is to one of those attempts, in my judgment the most insidious, dangerous, and subversive that has been suggested during this session of Congress, that I shall mainly invite the attention of the House. The point to which I refer is based upon a suggestion that, several days ago, fell from the lips of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] whom I am sorry not to see in his seat. It amounts, using his own language, to this proposition, that Congress has the power, under the Constitution of the United States as it now stands, to "so regulate the suffrage as to give the right of suffrage to every male citizen of the country of twenty-one years of age, whether a citizen by birth or naturalization." In view of the facts connected with the history of our Constitution and its formation, it does appear to me that this proposition is one of the most dangerous and startling that has yet been suggested in connection with our national policy, and if adopted, it cannot fail, sooner or later, to subvert the most beneficent principles of our system of government.

Before I proceed, I call attention to the fact that the honorable gentleman invites a direct issue with the President of the United States upon this subject. Now, I may here remark that, so far as the President is concerned in connection with this and every other question, either now or hereafter, demanding fit action at the hands of this Congress, if anything that shall fall from my lips shall seem to be a defense of him, it must be taken as tending in that direction simply and solely because in my judgment it is right, and not because he is my President in any partisan sense or I his champion. I am here to do my duty to the extent of my humble ability, and I am resolved at least to be at one with my own conscience and my own judgment. The President has said in his annual message that "it is not competent for the General Government to extend the elective franchise in the several States." The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania replies that that question "was settled by the express language of the Constitution right the other way;" and then, in a spirit more of satire than of kindness or respect, he adds:

"It is evident that the absorbing duties in which he was engaged while military governor of Tennessee and of the high office to which he was suddenly and unexpectedly called have prevented President Johnson from examining that question historically."

I propose now, for a few moments, to examine this question with a somewhat extensive reference to the history of the Constitution in this connection, and if possible to arrive at a conclusion whether the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has given greater attention to the history of this question than the President, and whether the conclusion which he has reached is a safer one for the country or more in harmony with the history and true intent of the Constitution than that of the President.

At the time this provision in the Constitution on the subject of the qualifications of electors in the different States was under the consideration of the constitutional Convention, we all know that there existed in the States a very great diversity of provisions and regulations upon this subject of suffrage. They differed both in extent and principle. In some of the States the suffrage was extended upon principles of great liberality to almost all men of competent age; while in other States it was extended upon principles of less liberality, and in some States it was limited by lingering principles of the feudal system, which still prevailed in the laws of descent and the transmission of property in some of the States.

It was in view of these diversities that the constitutional Convention approached the consideration of this question. And we are told by Mr. Story, in his excellent Commentaries on that sacred charter of our liberty, that for obvious reasons it would have been improper to leave that subject open for the occasional regulation of Congress, even as to the qualification of electors for Representatives to its own body; and therefore it was settled in the Constitution itself, and placed forever beyond the control of Congress. (Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, sec. 583.)

The Constitution declares that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."—Constitution, art. 1, sec. 2, clause 1.

Now, who determines those qualifications in the respective States? I say that the people of the several States themselves determine those qualifications, and no other power on earth is authorized to interfere. The language of the Constitution is clear and emphatic. It is too plain to require interpretation. It establishes a rule which, in the nature of our Government, cannot be uniform. It is to be fixed by each State for itself. And upon this point I desire to invite attention for a moment to a few authorities, and they are authorities of great weight and distinction in the constitutional history of our country; authorities entitled to the very highest consideration at the hands of their posterity. And first, Alexander Hamilton, one of the earliest and greatest and purest expounders of our Federal Constitution, who may be ranked as standing at the head of our great statesmen of the earlier school. What does he say? In No. 52 of the Federalist he uses this language:

"To have reduced the different qualifications in the different States to one uniform rule would probably have been as dissatisfactory to some of the States as it would have been difficult to the Convention. The provision made by the Convention appears, therefore, to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established or which may be established by the State itself. It will be safe to the United States, because, being fixed by the State constitutions, it is not alterable by the State governments; and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitutions in such manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution."

And in this connection I beg leave to invite the attention of the House to a fact, perhaps forgotten by some, that this number of the Federalist may be quoted with equal propriety as expressing the deliberate opinion and judgment of Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Madison; because, in every list of the numbers of that work ever furnished by Mr. Madison himself he claimed that he, and not Mr. Hamilton, was the author of No. 52; and Mr. Hamilton, in some of his lists, claimed that he was its author, and not Mr. Madison. But the claim that is made by both of those distinguished statesmen for the paternity of this number of the Federalist is enough to establish the fact that both of them approved, indorsed, and adopted as his own the opinions expressed in it. I therefore quote it now as expressing the equally deliberate judgment of Mr. Madison himself upon this subject.

And in this connection I will briefly invite attention to another authority. I quote now from the History of the Constitution, by Mr. Curtis. I read it for the purpose of showing what were the intentions, as he understands them, of the framers of this particular part of the Constitution. He says:

"The committee of detail, after a review of all these considerations, presented a scheme that was well adapted to meet the difficulties of the case. They proposed that the same persons who, by the laws of the several States, were admitted to vote for members of the most numerous branch of their own Legislature, should have the right to vote for the Representatives of Congress. The adoption of this principle avoided the necessity of disfranchising any portion of the people of a State by a system of qualifications unknown to their laws. As the States were the best judges of the circumstances and temper of their own people, it was certainly best to conciliate them to the support of the new Constitution by this concession. It was possible, indeed, but not very probable, that they might admit foreigners to the right of voting without the previous qualification of citizenship. It was possible, too, that they might establish universal suffrage in its most unrestricted sense. But against all these evils there existed one great security, namely, that the mischief of an absolutely free suffrage would be felt most severely by themselves in their own domestic concerns; and against the special danger to be apprehended from the indiscriminate admission of foreigners to the right of voting, another feature of the proposed plan gave the national Legislature power to withhold from persons of foreign birth the privileges of general citizenship, although a State might confer upon them the power of voting without previous naturalization."

I will read no more of that authority, but simply add that in a somewhat lengthy review of this subject Mr. Curtis fully sustains the expressed opinions of Mr. Madison and Mr. Hamilton, and the present Executive of the United States.

I think it will be generally conceded by most men in this country that if this great power which is claimed by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] exists at all, it cannot be found to rest upon this provision of the Constitution, but must find its abiding place in another clause of the Constitution, which I will now read to the House. It is as follows:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."—Constitution, art. 1, sec. 4, clause 1.

Now, I invite attention to the obvious fact that this provision of the Constitution is limited by its own terms to certain objects. What are they? First, to the "times." Times of what? The times of holding the elections. Second, to the "places." The places for what? The places for holding the elections. Third, to the "manner." Now, I invite attention to the obvious meaning of that word taken in connection with the context. The manner of what? Is it the manner of determining the qualifications of electors? Is it intended to refer to the mode in which the persons who are to exercise this franchise shall be determined? No, sir; it relates solely to the manner of holding elections, not the manner of determining who shall vote or who shall not vote. Such is the construction placed upon this provision by Mr. Justice Story, whose examination of the history of the Constitution was perhaps more thorough and exhaustive than that of any other jurist or statesman in our country. He disposes of the monstrous idea that Congress may regulate elections in the States, or that such purpose was ever cherished by the framers of the Constitution, in the following manner:

"What would be said of a clause introduced into the national Constitution to regulate the State elections of the members of the State Legislatures? It would be deemed a most unwarrantable transfer of power, indicating a premeditated design to destroy the State governments. It would be deemed so flagrant a violation of principle as to require no comment."—Story on Constitution, sec. 819.

Then, confining the power of Congress, under the provision in question, to the mere regulation of the times, places, and manner of holding elections, he approves it as demanded by possible emergencies that may arise in the history of the Union, and adds:

"There is no pretense to say that the power in the national Government can be used so as to exclude any State from its share in the representation in Congress. Nor can it be said with correctness that Congress can, in any way, alter the rights or qualifications of voters. The most that can be urged with any show of argument is, that the power might, in a given case, be employed in such a manner as to promote the election of some favorite candidate, or favorite class of men, in exclusion of others, by confining the places of election to particular districts, and rendering it impracticable for the citizens at large to partake in the choice."—Ibid., sec. 820.

Mr. Hamilton is equally emphatic in his mode of disposing of the theory that would tolerate the interference of Congress in the regulation of elections in the States for State officers. In No. 59 of the Federalist he says:

"Suppose an article had been introduced into the Constitution, empowering the United States to regulate the elections for the particular States, would any man have hesitated to condemn it, both as an unwarrantable transposition of power, and as a premeditated engine for the destruction of the State governments?"

In the next number of the Federalist, speaking more at length on the subject of the propriety of allowing Congress to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress, and of the alleged danger that Congress might so regulate them as to favor certain classes in the States, he further says:

"The truth is, that there is no method of securing to the rich the preference apprehended, but by prescribing qualifications of property either for those who may elect or be elected. But this forms no part of the power to be conferred upon the national Government. Its authority would be expressly restricted to the regulation of the times, the places, and the manner of elections. The qualifications of the persons who may choose or be chosen, as has been remarked upon another occasion, are defined and fixed in the Constitution; and are unalterable by the Legislature" [of the Union.]

Those views in reference to the history and just interpretation of that provision are substantially concurred in by Mr. Duer, in his Lectures on Constitutional Jurisprudence, and by Mr. Curtis, in the work to which I have already referred, the History of the Constitution.

Now, I desire very briefly to direct the attention of the House to some additional testimony on this subject derived from the proceedings of the Convention itself, as reported by James Madison. I propose from them to show that the interpretation for which I contend is the only true one, the only one of which the provision is fairly susceptible, and the only one which ever for a single instant entered the minds or controlled the action of the framers of the Constitution.

I invite attention now to what is called the fifth volume of Elliott's Debates. It is really the debates of the constitutional Convention, prepared by Mr. Madison. While the subject was under discussion on the 24th day of July, 1787, the following proceedings were had:

"MR. GOVERNOR MORRIS moved to strike out the last member of the section, beginning with the words 'qualifications of electors,' in order that some other provision might be substituted which would restrain the right of suffrage to freeholders.

"MR. FITZSIMMONS seconded the motion.

"MR. WILLIAMSON was opposed to it."

He was followed by Mr. Wilson, afterward one of the justices of the Supreme Court, appointed by Washington:

"MR. WILSON. This part of the report was well considered by the committee, and he did not think it could be changed for the better. It was difficult to form any uniform rule of qualifications for all the States. Unnecessary innovations, he thought, too, should be avoided. It would be very hard and disagreeable for the same persons, at the same time, to vote for Representatives in the State Legislature, and to be excluded from a vote for these in the national Legislature.

"MR. GOVERNOR MORRIS. Such a hardship would be neither great nor novel. The people are accustomed to it, and not dissatisfied with it, in several of the States. In some, the qualifications are different for the choice of Governor and of the Representatives; in others, for different houses of the Legislature. Another objection to the clause as it stands is, that it makes the qualifications of the national Legislature depend on the will of the States, which he thought not proper."

Then we have Mr. Ellsworth, afterward the second Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States:

"MR. ELLSWORTH thought the qualifications of the electors stood on the most proper footing. The right of suffrage was a tender point, and strongly guarded by most of the State constitutions. The people will not readily subscribe to the national Constitution, if it should subject them to be disfranchised. The States are the best judges of the circumstances and temper of their own people."

Some remarks were made by Colonel Mason, who was a distinguished member of the Convention from Virginia. After several other distinguished members had expressed their views, and all in entire harmony with the views of Story and Hamilton, which I have quoted, James Madison, as reported by himself, used the following language:

"The right of suffrage is certainly one of the fundamental articles of republican Government, and ought not to be left to be regulated by the Legislature" [of the Union.]

The illustrious Dr. Franklin, a member of the Convention, in some characteristic remarks, opposed the motion of Mr. Morris, and gave the weight of his great influence to retain the provision as reported by the committee and as explained in the preceding discussion. In the same connection, I refer to the remarks of George Nicholas in the convention of Virginia. They are to be found in the third volume of Elliott's Debates, page 41:

"I will consider it first, then, as to the qualifications of the electors. The best writers on government agree that in a republic those laws which fix the right of suffrage are fundamental; if, therefore, by the proposed plan it is left uncertain in whom the right of suffrage is to rest, or if it has placed that right in improper hands, I shall admit that it is a radical defect; but in this plan there is a fixed rule for determining the qualifications of electors, and that rule the most judicious that could possibly have been devised, because it refers to a criterion which cannot be changed. A qualification that gives a right to elect Representatives for the State Legislatures gives also by this Constitution a right to choose Representatives for the General Government. As the qualifications of electors are different in the different States, no particular qualifications, uniform through the States, would have been politic, as it would have caused a great inequality in the electors, resulting from the situation and circumstances of the respective States. Uniformity of qualifications would greatly affect the yeomanry in the States, as it would either exclude from this inherent right some who are entitled to it by the laws of some States at present, or be extended so universally as to defeat the admirable end of the institution of representation."

On a subsequent day, when the same provision was under consideration, Mr. Madison again expressed his views. I should not be disposed to refer to him again, but the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] in his reply to the points so well made by the honorable gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] the other day, quoted in defense of his own theory the remarks of Mr. Madison on the latter occasion. In order to show the entire consistency of those views with Mr. Madison's more deliberately expressed opinion in the Federalist, I will incorporate a part of them into my argument.

Mr. Madison reports himself as saying:

"The necessity of a General Government supposes that the State Legislatures will sometimes fail or refuse to consult the common interest at the expense of their local convenience or prejudices. The policy of referring the appointment of the House of Representatives to the people, and not to the Legislatures of the States, supposes that the result will be somewhat influenced by the mode. This view of the question seems to decide that the Legislatures of the States ought not to have the uncontrolled right of regulating the times, places, and manner of holding elections. These were words of great latitude. It was impossible to foresee all the abuses that might be made of the discretionary power."

Now I invite attention at this point to the obvious construction that was put by Mr. Madison upon these words, "the times, the places, and the manner of holding elections." And it is clearly inferable, from what he says, that he understood these things to relate, not to the qualifications of electors, but to various circumstances connected with the holding of elections, not embracing the qualifications of electors at all. He says further:

"Whether the electors should vote by ballot or à viva voce, should assemble at this place or that place, should be divided into districts, or all meet at one place, should all vote for all the Representatives, or all in a district vote for a member allotted to the district; these and many other points would depend on the Legislatures, and might materially affect the appointments. Whenever the State Legislatures had a favorite measure to carry, they would take care so to mold their regulations as to favor the candidates they wished to succeed.

"Besides, the inequality of representation in the Legislatures of particular States would produce a like inequality in their representation in the national Legislature; and it was presumable that the counties, having the power in the former case, would secure it to themselves in the latter.

"What danger would there be in giving a controlling power to the national Legislature? Of whom was it to consist? First, of a Senate, to be chosen by the State Legislatures. If the latter, therefore, could be trusted, their Representatives could not be dangerous. Secondly, of Representatives elected by the same people who elect the State Legislatures. Surely then, if confidence is due to the latter, it must be due to the former. It seems as improper in principle, though it might be less inconvenient in practice, to give to the State Legislatures this great authority over the election of the Representatives of the people in the general Legislature, as it would be to give to the latter a like power over the election of their Representatives in the State Legislature."

It should be borne in mind that the qualifications of electors for members of Congress and State officers were, at the time of the formation of our Constitution, fixed in every State, in the constitution of the State, and were not subject to control or modification by the State Legislatures. All the State Legislatures could do could only consist in laws regulating the times, places, and manner of holding the elections. Least they should in any contingency, or for any purpose or causes, fail to regulate these matters with reference to the election of Congressmen, it was thought necessary to give to Congress the power to regulate them, so that it might prevent an entire failure of representation from any State. It is, therefore, no doubt competent for Congress to prescribe by law when the congressional elections shall be held in all the States, and at what places they shall be held, and in what manner they shall be held; that is, whether the people of a whole State shall all vote for the number of Congressmen to which that State is entitled, or the State be divided into districts, and the people of each district vote for one member only. But Congress has no power to prescribe by law who shall vote, or what shall constitute the qualifications of a voter for a member of Congress. Nor has it any power to dictate when or where or how elections shall be held for officers of the State government, or who shall vote at them.

Now, I have cited or referred to every known expression of opinion on this subject by any American statesman, publicist, or jurist of distinction, and shown that they all, with a unanimity almost unparalleled, concur in the same interpretation of the power of Congress under the provision in question. The practice of the Government, without a single example to the contrary, sustains the same construction. Such an extent of power on this subject over the States as is now claimed for Congress, if it had been asserted by any party prior to our late most deplorable rebellion, would have convulsed the nation to its extremest boundaries with excitement and apprehension. It would have been more than sufficient, if avowed in the constitutional Convention, to have defeated forever the adoption of the Constitution by the people of the States. It will be sufficient now, if conceded to exist, to subvert the great principle of local self-government, which is the chief bulwark of our liberties.

Against the array of authorities to which I have referred in vindication of this great principle, against the absorbing power of Congress, what authority is produced? Not one clear, direct, or unequivocal authority in the whole range of American statesmanship or history can be found to the contrary. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] with the aid of his great legal and general learning, can sustain his position by nothing better than the following from 3 Elliott's Debates, page 344, which is attributed to Mr. Madison:

"With respect to the other point, it was thought that the regulation of the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent. Some States might regulate the elections on the principles of equality, and others might regulate them otherwise. This diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some States, particularly in South Carolina, with respect to Charleston, which has a representation of thirty members. Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government. It was found impossible to fix the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives in the Constitution. It was found necessary to leave the regulation of this, in the first place, to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. And considering the State government and General Government as distinct bodies, acting in different and independent capacities for the people, it was thought the particular regulations should be submitted to the former and the general regulations to the latter. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures, the congressional control will very probably never be exercised. The power appears to me satisfactory and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution."

This language is said to have been used by Mr. Madison in the Virginia convention of 1788, for the ratification of the Constitution of the United States, at a time when the provision in question was under consideration in that body.

But let it be remembered that this extract is not the language of Mr. Madison, was not reported by him, and has never had his approval. It is merely an attempt by some one to give the substance of what he said on the occasion referred to. It was not taken down by an official reporter. In the language of Mr. Elliott himself, "it was collected and revised from contemporaneous publications," long years after it was spoken, perhaps from some loose newspaper report made at the time, and was published, I believe, in 1827. It bears intrinsic evidence of inexactness and want of authenticity. It makes Mr. Madison, whose ideas, when expressed by himself, are always in words most carefully and fitly chosen, say that "it was thought that the regulation of the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent." Every expression in it is consistent with the prevailing idea through all the proceedings of the Convention that Congress should have no power to fix qualifications of voters in the States, either for State officers or for Representatives in Congress. It might regulate the mode of holding the elections for Representatives, so as to prevent a failure of representation. As to this mode of holding elections, as Mr. Madison said, some States might regulate it on principles of equality, and others, by various regulations as to the times and places where the elections should be held, might make them affect unequally the people of certain sections of a State, and be, therefore, unjust. But Congress, having no motive to so regulate these times and places as to make them bear unequally on different sections in a State, could properly be entrusted with their control as to congressional elections. But with all its manifest looseness and inexactness of form, every sentence in this extract is readily reconcilable with the more deliberate and self-written judgments of Mr. Madison and all the other fathers and sages to whom I have referred. I unhesitatingly affirm, therefore, that it wholly fails to justify in any degree the structure erected upon it by the honorable gentleman. On the contrary, taken in connection with all I have shown, it stamps the whole theory of the honorable gentleman as most dangerous and revolutionary.

But admit for a moment that all the framers, the fathers, the expounders of the Constitution, and President Johnson, are wrong, and that the honorable gentleman is right, then what follows? If you concede the power to be in Congress, as claimed, then the discretion of Congress in its exercise cannot be limited. It can legislate to enlarge or abridge the right of suffrage in the States, both in the choice of members of Congress and of Representatives in the State Legislatures. It can impose a property qualification. It can give suffrage to black men and take it from white men where it pleases. It can prohibit every white man in the South from voting for such officers unless he was born in New England, or owns a certain number of Federal bonds that are exempt from taxation, or will take some new-fangled iron-clad oath. It can annul State statutes and State constitutions on the subject of suffrage at its own pleasure.

It makes Congress, in many respects, as absolutely supreme in its control over the local affairs and interests of the people of the States as the British Parliament is over the affairs and interests of the people of Great Britain. It can go into South Carolina and take suffrage from the lately disloyal whites and give it to the negroes. It can go into Missouri and enfranchise the now disfranchised participants in the late rebellion in that State. It can go into Indiana and set aside our constitutional barriers in its way, and give equal suffrage to the negroes and white men. If this power be conceded, then I may inquire, what, in God's name, cannot Congress do? We have indeed fallen upon evil times. The war in the field is ended. But the war upon the most cherished principles and safeguards of our institutions is yet flagrant.

Mr. Speaker, I now submit in all confidence that the position assumed by the Executive upon this important question is sustained alike and most triumphantly by the history of the Constitution, the solemn and deliberately recorded opinions of its framers, and the uniform practice of the Government hitherto. The issue the honorable gentleman has chosen to make with him on this subject seems equally untenable and unhappy.

Now, on the subject more directly engaging the attention of the House, the proposed amendment of the Constitution, I desire to submit but a few remarks. I am not in favor of its adoption. It fails to commend itself to my judgment for many reasons. It is inopportune to attempt such vital changes in our Constitution now. The times are not auspicious for such important work to be well or wisely done. It is not justified by the circumstances of the country. It is not demanded by the highest interests of the whole country. It is not commended to my judgment by the motives which are avowed here by its friends and prompted its introduction. Such radical changes should be made, if made at all, by the nation, by all the States in full council, and not by a part only. It should be submitted to the most full, unrestricted, and searching examination here by the Representatives of all the States, who will have to sit in judgment upon its ratification before it can become the law of the land.

Honorable gentlemen propose so to change the Constitution as that—

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

Now, I invite attention for a very short time to an examination of the words I have quoted: "Representatives are to be apportioned." Representatives of what? In the State Legislatures? No; but Representatives in Congress; and "direct taxes are to be apportioned." Direct taxes to be imposed by whom? Not by the States or the people of the States, but by Congress. In other words, everything connected with the subject of this proposed amendment relates to the powers of Congress, to the representation of the States in Congress.

Now, I desire to put this case to gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber: suppose the people of the State of Ohio, in which State there may be say a half a million of colored people, declare in their fundamental law that those negroes may vote, who are qualified by age, for members of Congress, but shall not vote for members of the State Legislature, or for Governor, or for any State officer, or for any municipal officers in the State of Ohio. What, then, will Congress do? Could you say that by reason of this amendment the negro population of Ohio shall not be counted in the basis of representation of that State in Congress? I take it you cannot say that, because by the very language of this amendment the people of the States retain the power to regulate the right of suffrage within the States as they please, and having extended equal suffrage to negroes in elections for members of Congress, the object of this amendment is answered. It does not require that there shall be no discrimination on account of class or color in the adjustment of the franchise for State purposes.

It has been suggested here, by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] that the position assumed on this subject by his colleague [Mr. SHELLBARGER] is not correct, because the position of the latter gentleman assumes that this amendment, if adopted by the States of this Union, would confer upon the States a grant of power, by express terms, to deny to a certain class, or any class of the people within the State, the right of suffrage, if the people of the State should see fit to do so.

[Here he hammered fell.]

Mr. RAYMOND obtained the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. With the consent of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] I will move that the time of my colleague [Mr. KERR] be extended so as to allow him to conclude his remarks.

Mr. KERR. I will not occupy any further time if it is to come out of the time of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND.]

The SPEAKER. It will not come out of his time.

Mr. KERR. Then I should be glad if I could be allowed, say fifteen minutes more, to conclude what I have to say.

No objection was made.

Mr. KERR. I will reply to the position assumed by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] that in my judgment there is not in this proposition a grant of power to the States to regulate suffrage within their own limits. I assume that that power exists in the States and the people now; that it always has existed there; that it exists and inheres in the people of the States, and was never surrendered by them to Congress, nor to any other authority. According to my construction of our system of government, I do not think that Congress is the granting power in this country. I take it that political power finds its foundation and its source in the people of the States, and not in Congress. Power comes from below, from the people; it does not go from here to the people.

Now, in the case I have supposed, if the people of Ohio, either by their fundamental law, or by their statute law, do not suffer persons of this emancipated race to exercise the right of elective franchise within that State, what, then, is the result? The entire negro population of Ohio, or of any other State that should make the like regulations of the elective franchise, is denied representation in Congress. The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] tells us that this is imposed by way of penalty upon the people of the State for refusing to adopt this modern idea of absolute and universal suffrage. In other words, it is a new kind of argument to compel them to grant negro suffrage. I inquire now, what right has Congress to ask States to impose upon themselves this kind of penalty, and who is injured by the penalty? Is it the white man or the negro? The gentleman professes to be laboring here to benefit and ameliorate the condition of the negro in this country; yet I submit that the effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be to make worse the condition of the negro, and turn him over to the complete control of the State where he may happen to live. It denies to him any representation here, any relief at the hands of Congress. Is the negro benefited then? Is the country at large benefited? Are the States benefited?

I can see but one single clear result that will follow from this amendment if it is adopted by the people of this country, and that is an effect that will inure not to the advantage of the nation, nor of any State in the Union, nor of any class or race of men in any State. But it will inure solely to the benefit and advantage of the Republican party. In my judgment the only persons who will gain by this provision will be the now dominant party in this country. They will thereby increase their power; they will thereby degrade the South; they will reduce her representation here, and relatively increase their own representation; they will confirm the sectional supremacy of the North in the legislation and administration of the Government. They may thus compel the South to become supplicants at their feet for justice, and it may be for mercy.

Now, taking this view of the effect of this provision, I cannot indorse it. If gentlemen have introduced this proposed amendment to the Constitution in the interest of equality, why do they not frame it so that it will produce genuine equality? Why do they not make it in its terms something that will tend to secure equality in the country in fact as well as in theory? Will it, if adopted, equalize representation in Congress? In the Senate of the United States, the very first principles of representative equality are and will continue to be violated. What is the fact to-day? The little State of Nevada, with one voter to about every forty in the State of New York, has the same representative power and influence in the Senate of the United States as the great State of New York. Is that equality? Is that right? It is not, if the theories for which gentlemen have contended here be correct.

The effect of the change will be to increase the inequality, unless the South extend equal suffrage to all their negroes in the election of Congressmen. This they will not do, in my judgment. They will take counsel of their prejudices and of their better knowledge of the true character of the negro and his fitness or unfitness for the exercise of suffrage. The greatest social and political problem of this age cannot be solved by the application of this kind of force or penalties.

But again, it was suggested by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that this provision ought to have gone further and abolished the present system of direct taxes, and that that should have been done in the interest of this same sort of love for equality in the adjustment of the operations of our Government. Why not do it? Why retain in the Constitution this provision which, upon its very face, is a most palpable and direct violation of every principle of equality, both in the representation here and in the distribution of the burdens of the Government upon the people of the several States? The abolition of slavery has made this change practicable by removing the chief foundation upon which it rested.

Representation and direct taxes are now required to be distributed among the different States upon what is called the rule of apportionment. What does that mean? It means that taxes on land shall be imposed by the Federal Government, not according to the value of the thing taxed, but according to the number of people in the State. What do we mean by direct taxes? We mean capitation taxes and taxes upon land. Now, why is it right to impose upon a poor State, whose population may be great, a tax equal to that imposed upon a wealthy State whose population is relatively much less? Massachusetts, for instance, with her wealthy people and her land worth $100 or $200 or $300 per acre, is constantly transporting her surplus population, but augmenting her relative wealth.

Now, I ask, why not abolish this singularly arbitrary mode of distributing the burdens of taxation? Why not abolish this provision altogether, and provide that direct taxes shall be assessed upon the principle of actual value, and let the acre in Kentucky pay taxes in proportion to its value as compared with the value of an acre owned in Rhode Island or Massachusetts? That would be equality. But as it is, the burdens of this Government rest most heavily upon the poorest States; most heavily upon the agricultural States, upon the land of the country, simply because they are not apportioned according to the actual value of the land, the actual wealth of the people, but according to the accidental numbers of the people of the several States. Governments are not formed and maintained alone for the protection of persons, but also of property. And persons and property should contribute to pay the burdens of the country mainly upon the basis of the actual value of the property owned. Is it equality to impose a capitation tax of five dollars per head on the poor negroes of the South, and only the same on the wealthy citizens of our richest communities? Yet the present Constitution requires substantially such disparity, and this amendment proposes to continue that state of things.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do think that while we should all approve this general principle of equality when it is properly applied, and when it is attempted to be extended in a spirit of fairness, a spirit of nationality, a spirit of equal justice to all men, I insist that here there is an attempt to extend it in but one direction, and that which will ultimately in increasing the political power and the sectional supremacy of a party and a geographical portion of this country in the management of Federal affairs. I am therefore opposed to this amendment, and I shall always oppose all such amendments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have treated somewhat at length the question of the right of Congress to legislate upon or control the subject of suffrage in the several States. I have also referred very briefly—too briefly to do justice to my own convictions or those of gentlemen on this side of the House—to the other and the main question now before us for consideration. I desire, however, to say, in this connection, that, in the discharge of my duties here, I have no desire to raise or carry on or countenance in any manner whatever any war of injustice upon any class of my countrymen. I look upon this Government, its laws, its Constitution, and its flag as designed for the protection and benefit of all the people of the country alike; and I care not whether they be black or white. I do not imagine that this Government was instituted for me and my children alone, but for every human being who may find here an abiding place.

I hold that every human being is entitled to justice at the hands of the Government, and I want to give justice to them. I want to give it to the black man as well as to the white man. I would protect the negro in all his civil rights as fully and amply as the white man, but I would leave all political privileges to be enjoyed as they now are; let us bring peace to the whole country with complete restoration of the component members to their appropriate places in the Union in the spirit of nationality and liberality; and afterward, when these matters are adjusted and settled, let us come to the consideration of these questions connected with proposed changes in our fundamental law or form of our government.

Mr. RAYMOND obtained the floor.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman to allow me to make a few remarks in reply to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] said the other day in allusion to me. I do not purpose to engage in any general discussion.

Mr. RAYMOND. As it is rather late, if there be no objection I would prefer to make my remarks on Monday.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will give the floor this evening to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and then to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who desires to make some remarks on the pending bill.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to enter into a general discussion of this proposed amendment. I think there is no occasion to enter into that, so far at least as the general interests which I seek now to protect are concerned; and I propose to confine myself to the reply to my remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] touching the powers now in the Constitution without amendment. He introduced his remarks the other day by the following declaration:

"Having interrupted the gentleman to invite his more particular attention to the language of Mr. Madison, I promised the gentleman that I would produce further authority on the point, which I did not happen to have by me at the time; and I trespass now for a brief moment upon the attention of the House that I may make good that promise, and may show that James Madison himself, on the 9th of August, 1787, on the floor of the Convention that framed the Constitution of the United States, carefully and elaborately excluded the conclusion announced by the gentleman from Iowa, and vindicated the doctrine which I presented to the House and maintain."

My own statement was as follows:

"It is evident that by the word 'manner' is meant something else; perhaps whether by ballot or viva voce, by general ticket or by separate districts, and all other things that come properly under the term 'manner.' But it evidently was never intended by Mr. Madison, or by the framers of the Constitution, or by the people when they adopted it, that the Legislatures and conventions of the several States might be deprived of the power to say who would be the qualified electors of the State Legislatures, and indirectly, the qualified electors of members of Congress."

I made certain citations from Mr. Madison to which the gentleman now brings a reply containing other declarations of Mr. Madison; and for that reply I desire especially to thank him, for it sustains the position I took as opposed to my friend's doctrine. I think that gentleman, and those who act with him in the proposed enterprise of depriving the States of their right to designate the qualifications of electors within their own jurisdictions and for their own Legislatures, should preface their speeches with this quotation, cited, I believe, from Wordsworth, advocating

"The good old rule, the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can."

That seems to be the maxim of those who give such a wide and indefinite construction to the Constitution of the United States. Now, sir, Mr. Madison, who is so highly commended by my able friend, said in a letter to Edmund Pendleton, which I find in the first volume of his writings:

"If the Federal Government should lose its proper equilibrium within itself, I am persuaded that the effect will proceed from the encroachments of the legislative department. If the possibility of encroachments on the part of the Executive or the Senate were to be compared, I should pronounce the danger to lie rather in the latter than the former."

Thus you find that Madison himself has cautioned us against the danger of encroachment upon the equilibrium established by the Constitution, that exists in the very body of Congress itself.

Upon this point at issue between us the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who, so far as I know, stands alone in this House in his view of the Constitution, rests substantially his whole argument upon that clause which he quoted from Elliot's Debates, and which reads as follows:

"Some States might regulate the elections on the principles of equality, and others might regulate them otherwise. This diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some States, particularly South Carolina, with respect to Charleston, which has a representation of thirty members. Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government."

This you find stated as his opinion by the compiler of the debates. But in condensing from his notes, the last sentence is a non sequitur. You get at the idea in the compiler's mind, however, by observing the illustration of the inequality in respect to Charleston. Charleston, with ten thousand inhabitants, might be authorized to elect one member of Congress, while twenty counties, with one hundred thousand inhabitants, might have the right to elect only one member; and it was proper that the General Government should remedy such an inequality. The Legislature of the State might provide that the electors should all vote in Charleston, or at any other point; or might cast their votes in the county seat only of each county, creating great inconvenience, and practically nullifying their right to vote by its excessive inconvenience. They could also regulate the vote, whether viva voce or by ballot, &c. All these things relate to the manner of holding elections. When I suggested, the other day, that probably Madison meant such questions as voting viva voce, or by local or general ticket, and other like things connected with the "manner of holding elections," the gentleman was disposed rather to ridicule the idea, and said he evidently meant the electoral right itself. Now, he puts in Madison's mouth the identical words I suggested as undoubtedly within Madison's meaning. Now, let me show that I stated it correctly.

The following is the gentleman's own quotation:

"It was impossible to foresee all the abuses that might be made of the discretionary power. Whether the electors should vote by ballot or viva voce, should assemble at this place or that place, should be divided into districts or all meet at one place, should all vote for all the Representatives, or all in a district vote for a number allotted to the district—these and many other points would depend on the Legislatures, and might materially affect the appointments."

What language could be more positive and precise as to what Madison meant by the words "manner of holding elections?" Nothing can be stronger in support of the view I have taken of his meaning, and of the Constitution, than the very language cited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] It assumes that electors are already provided for, for he says, "whether the electors should vote;" not "what electors should vote," or "what qualifications should exist." He shows that the right of suffrage is one thing and the mode of suffrage is another thing. Listen for a moment to the language of Madison in the letter addressed to John Brown of Kentucky, in the year 1785, found in the same volume:

1. "Whether is a representation according to numbers, or property, or in a joint proportion to both, the most safe? Or is a representation by counties preferable to a more equitable mode that will be difficult to adjust? Under this question may be considered, first, the right of suffrage; second, the mode of suffrage; third, the plan of representation."

A palpable, pointed distinction by Madison just before the adoption of the Constitution, distinguishing between the right of suffrage and the mode of suffrage. And I presume my friend will admit that there is no greater synonym in the English language than "mode" and "manner." If he doubts, I refer him to Webster's Dictionary.

Further, Mr. Madison says, pursuing the same distinction:

"As to the first, I think the extent which ought to be given to this right a matter of great delicacy and of critical importance. To restrain it to the landholders will in time exclude too great a proportion of citizens without regard to property, or even to all who possess a pittance, may throw too much power into hands which will either abuse it themselves or sell it to the rich who will abuse it. I have thought it might be a good middle course to narrow this right in the choice of the least popular, and to enlarge it in that of the more popular branch of the Legislature. There is an example of this distinction in North Carolina, if in none of the other States." In a general view, I see no reason why the rights of property, which chiefly bears the burden of Government, and is so much an object of legislation, should not be respected as well as personal rights in the choice of rulers."

Thus we see that great statesman, so far from going for universal suffrage, so far from confusing the "manner of holding elections" with the right of voting at an election, made this distinction pointedly, and asserted the necessity of balancing the representation of one interest by the representation of another.

Then he says:

"Second, as to the mode of suffrage, I lean strongly to that of the ballot, notwithstanding the objections which lie against it. It appears to me to be the only radical cure for those arts of electioneering which poison the very fountain of liberty. The States in which the ballot has been the standing mode are the only instances in which elections are tolerably chaste and those arts in disgrace. If it should be thought improper to fix this mode by the Constitution, I should think it at least necessary to avoid any constitutional bar to a future adoption of it."

There is a specific illustration showing what Mr. Madison did mean by the words "mode of suffrage." It was simply the way in which the qualified electors should make their will known, and not to declare who should be qualified electors. Mr. Madison stood upon the explicit declaration which I cited from the Federalist the other day, that that clause which left the question of qualification to the States "must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established or which may be established by the State itself."

And again, in that other citation which I made from his declaration written long after the adoption of the Constitution:

"States can, through forms of the constitutional elective provisions, control the General Government. This [the General Government] has no agency in electing State governments, and can only control them through the functionaries, particularly the judiciary, of the General Government."

Now, I have cited enough to show that there was a distinction broad and clear made by Mr. Madison between the "right of suffrage" and the "mode of suffrage," that that distinction runs all through his writings, and all through his debates; and further that Mr. Madison was exceedingly scrupulous touching the right of suffrage itself as to the extent to which it should be carried in view of the safety of the country and all its great interests.

I submit, then, in view of these citations, and of the declarations of Mr. Madison quoted by the gentleman himself, and which I read a few moments ago, that it is a little remarkable that my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania should close his observations with the declaration that he had now redeemed his promise to establish beyond question his view of Mr. Madison's declarations touching the construction of this clause of the Constitution.

While I agree with the gentleman that we have a right to control the times, places, and manner of voting for members of Congress, the gentleman goes further, and maintains that we have a right to control the electoral qualifications in local State elections, thus absorbing the most important element of our municipal liberties and domestic rights.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to say upon that subject. I only wish to add generally touching amendments to the Constitution, this and all others, that I am firm in the conviction that no amendment to that great instrument ought to be adopted by this House or submitted to the country, except those which look to the great future of the country and the safety of all parts of this country, rather than to the mere embarrassment and incumbrance of a particular portion of it. It may bear upon the South to-day as we want it to bear; it may next year, or a few years hence, bear upon us at the North as we should be most reluctant to have it bear. Immigration flows in tides to and fro; manufacturing, commercial, and agricultural interests move to and fro in different sections of this Union; majorities change from year to year; the opinions of men change; and I think it the duty of all statesmen to do what Mr. Madison said was the object of a more conservative Senate, that is, to resist the "occasional impetuosities," as he styled them of the more numerous branch of the Legislature, that the great permanent principles that underlie this Government may have themselves a permanency which is far better than a fluctuating fundamental law, changed to meet some immediate or temporary occasion. Better submit to some ills that we know than rush into others that we know not of.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to have remained a silent spectator of the stirring scenes which we are witnessing in this Hall upon the important subject under consideration. But silence has ceased to be a virtue. To manifest indifference on so important a subject as that under discussion would justify my constituents in charging me with almost criminal neglect. If I understand the object of the amendment now before the House, it contemplates a radical change in the organic law of the nation, and in the character and quality of the voting population. In the few remarks I purpose to make on this occasion, I will endeavor to deal with the subject fairly and with candor. This continued tinkering with the Constitution is pregnant with danger in the last degree. And although I arrive at a different conclusion from my honorable friend from Rhode Island, still, I thank him for arresting, by his judicious remarks, the novel and dangerous practice of locomotive legislation.

Sir, this is a question that calls for our gravest consideration and the most mature reflection. Yet the patriarchal chairman of the committee, who brought forward this amendment and applied the gag of the previous question to cut off all debate, seemed inclined to treat it as an ordinary resolution of the passing hour. In this, I think, with great respect, he committed an error, and the subsequent action of the House has served to convince me of his mistake and of their better judgment.

Sir, only a few days since a bill was introduced to foist over the unfortunate and unrepresented people of the District of Columbia unqualified universal negro suffrage. Through the medium of the previous question it passed through all the forms of law, as far as this House is concerned, in a single hour. Perhaps this measure of "indecent haste," in the opinion of the radicals, is necessary to carry out their programme, which, in my humble opinion, if successful, will be but the entering wedge to a great design to thwart the President in his plan of reconstruction, to bar the Representatives of the southern States from admission by requiring an oath, the constitutionality of which has been doubted, to coerce the southern States into a concession of negro suffrage and negro equality, or to promote a war of races, having for its sole and only object the retention of political power in the hands of the radicals. Sir, what gave birth to that extraordinary proposition? Did it emanate from the people who are to be affected by it, or may it not be regarded rather as a spasmodic effort to test the power of endurance of those unfortunates placed by the organic law under our special care and protection?

Mr. Speaker, this District, so frequently maligned, which has neither Representative nor Delegate, has furnished several thousand patriotic men to swell the noble Army of the Union. They fought to save the Republic, to emancipate the negro race from the thralldom of slavery, and now return to be subjugated by the very race they have freed. The right to rule should bring with it the exercise of a reasonable discretion and a regard for the dispensation of equal and exact justice, of which no honest man can or ought to divest himself. Sir, I have never been an ultra man on any subject. I have the honor to represent a large, intelligent, patriotic, and conservative constituency. They are men who cannot be excelled in the exhibition of the highest order of humanity toward the negro. I am unable to say what effect time, cultivation, and education of that race may produce upon the minds of those I represent; but I may safely venture the assurance that at the present time the great body of my constituents are unprepared to be made a party to the plan of immediate, unqualified, universal negro suffrage. This is carrying the joke, if it be such, a little too far.

Sir, if we were startled by such a proposition, affecting only the District of Columbia, the nation will be astounded to learn that it is in contemplation by the radicals to seize upon the Constitution and extend by a so-called amendment the area of this iniquity until its pernicious effects shall be felt from the center to the extreme limits of the Republic. What Congress could not or would not do in making a direct issue with the President upon his humane plan of reconstruction, is now sought by this amendment to be compassed by indirection. It is boldly demanded, in furtherance of this project, that coercion of the southern people will be resorted to to compel them to relinquish the ancient and well-settled right to regulate the exercise of the elective franchise in their respective States, and give the negroes unqualified free suffrage, or, until these requirements are acceded to, to diminish or to exclude all the Representatives from the non-consenting States. This bold attempt to substitute numerical force in the place of constitutional law is to my mind subversive of the Government, and an exhibition of tyranny in its worst and most repulsive form. It is a policy that risks all to save all; and I am in doubt as to which will excel in turpitude, the boldness of its conception, or the baseness of its consummation.

Sir, the southern States are called conquered territories. A few days ago, on this floor, a telegram announced that the State of Georgia (one of those self-same conquered territories) had completed the number of States necessary to the adoption of the constitutional amendment for the extinguishment of slavery. This Hall resounded with the plaudits of all within it who approved the act. So anxious were the radicals to carry out their idea that they did not scruple to apply to or coerce three of those conquered territories to legalize the emancipation amendment. Now, the Constitution of the United States requires the approval of the Legislatures of three fourths of the States to perfect the adoption of a constitutional amendment. As such the action of these States was legal, and this House committed itself by its acknowledgment and acceptance. They certainly could not receive such a vote as coming from Territories, as that would be clearly in violation of the organic law. But there was no alternative. They had to be received as States within the Union or not at all. The Clerk had even refused to place upon his list either of those three States by whose votes the desired end had been attained. Yet the House refused to keep up the unities, for in five minutes afterward, when the legally elected Representatives from those States offered their credentials, their right of admittance was denied, the doors of this Hall barred against them, and they were turned ignominiously away. I declare here boldly that such shameful inconsistency and injustice will recoil upon all who participated in its consummation.

Sir, many months have elapsed since we were chosen members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. At that time the war was raging fiercely, and no man could foresee the time when the rebellion could be finally squelched. To maintain and preserve the Union in its integrity was the one grand idea. The Government needed support. It was asked from all men of all parties to yield to the emergency and stand by the Constitution and the Union at all hazards and in all events. This was done—and we are here. Nay, more. Even at the election last fall the only issue was upon the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, which now is an accomplished fact. We were told that this done, we stood well assured of speedy reconstruction and an immediate return to the palmy days of peace and prosperity. But, sir, how fallacious are all human hopes. We had believed that that Constitution, framed in the spirit of wisdom and replete with the noblest sentiments of patriotism and justice, would still be left to us as our guide and rule of conduct, untouched and uncontaminated by the ruthless hand of fanaticism. No sooner did Congress meet than we were overwhelmed with some sixty or seventy proposed amendments to that glorious old organic law that for seventy years has nobly withstood the storms and tempests of time, "the battle and the breeze;" and all these in the interest of the radicals. Amendment after amendment, and substitute upon substitute, has been offered, but so far as I can learn no line has been written nor a single suggestion made in the interest of the million and a half of those noble men who achieved all that we are now rejoicing over, and who daily besiege the Departments for bounties, pay, and pensions.

Sir, it is next to my heart to see those bounties equalized and the amount of those pensions increased. It has been intimated that these honest and just claims are to be ignored upon the plea that it will operate against a wise economy. But, sir, I argue this is a false economy. Economy must always yield to justice. When the bugle of the warrior sounded the first alarm, soldier and sailor went promptly to the rescue of the nation. All that they sought was the faithful performance of a patriotic duty, hopeful, however, that the nation's gratitude would in some degree satisfy them for the sacrifices they had made. But the wail of the widow and the cry of the poor orphan are as yet unheard in this Hall, or, if heard, are unheeded.

The few millions to be thus appropriately disposed would add but little to the national debt, which must and will be paid to the last dollar. Deny the boon these poor soldiers and sailors crave, and we shall commit an injustice almost amounting to a crime; for while you send them away home with empty hands you compel them to pay their full share of the national indebtedness. If this be justice, then to Heaven alone can the soldier and the sailor look for assistance.

Mr. Speaker, I now approach another branch of the subject, pregnant with interest to the entire nation. All of us knew that the amendment to secure unqualified and universal suffrage for the negro was to take "effect before sundown." But we were not aware of the pressing necessity of its speedy passage until it was disclosed by the great radical leader, namely, that it might be presented to Legislatures already elected and in session. Thanks to the conservative members upon the other side of the House for their manly resistance against thus stifling debate upon so momentous a question, affecting as it does the paramount interest of the country, our people, and in fact of the whole civilized world. Sir, I think I have a right to accuse the radical leaders of insincerity. If the Democratic Union party were in power in half of the States, I apprehend the radical leaders would not be quite so anxious to press this matter here and now, but would rather be willing to move, festina lente, until the necessity of a new election would permit the question to be fairly, honestly, and squarely submitted to the people themselves. They are the proper judges, and no honest Representative can or ought to shrink from the ordeal.

Mr. Speaker, what is the real question before us? It is not simply the emancipation of the colored race, but it contemplates their entire enfranchisement, elevating them without regard to necessity or capacity to a political, and necessarily to a personal and social, equality with the white race. I most respectfully aver that this result would promote an injustice. The negroes, left to themselves, secure in their recently acquired freedom, would be perfectly satisfied with their lot but for the officious meddling of political fanatics. To accomplish the complete subjugation of the southern people these latter suddenly become the advocates of negro equality, forgetful of the consequences that may ensue. Once inaugurate that principle, and it will inevitably lead to a war of races, which may God in His infinite mercy avert. The negro in his simple ignorance is content with his lot. Accustomed to obey, and unused to command, he gracefully accepts his fate, and is happy. But that will not answer the purpose of the fanatics. To lose the negro would absorb their capital and force them into involuntary bankruptcy. Discarding the sage counsels of the wise and conservative men of the country, the "sable sons of Ethiopia," too ignorant to comprehend, and too hopeful to resist, yield readily to fate, and allow themselves to be set up as idols in the worship of fanatical Vandalism, and become the ready victims of political prostitution. They are petted and praised, and learn from these fanatics for the first time that they are a persecuted race.

They are, in their simplicity, made to believe that their wonderful prowess alone secured the suppression of the rebellion, without the slightest aid or assistance from the "poor white trash" truthfully called the Army of the Union; that gallant band of heroes who upheld the flag of the free, fought for and secured the integrity of the Union, suppressed a gigantic insurrection, and gave to the world an example of patriotism and physical power unparalleled and unsurpassed. Flushed with success, exulting over their triumph, they return to their homes expecting to receive the earnest plaudits of a grateful people; but, alas for all human hopes, they were destined to disappointment. They were met at the very threshold with a new enemy—the eternal, everlasting, inevitable "nigger." It was "nigger" in the field, "nigger" in the fence, "nigger" on the brain, and "nigger" in the atmosphere. For whose benefit, let me ask, was this apparent homage paid? For the negro? Oh! no. He was simply an instrument in the hands of those who expected to profit by the experiment.

This unjust adulation of an inferior race, whose comprehension failed to appreciate the subtleties of political fanaticism, prepared them for the work of coöperation as soon as they were informed by these disinterested friends how badly they had been used, and how speedily by combination the evil might be remedied. Appropos, the celebrated barrister, John Philpot Curran, was once employed in a case arising out of a personal injury. It was not an aggravated case, but by the force of his eloquence and extraordinary descriptive powers, he succeeded in obtaining a large verdict. On reaching the vestibule of the court he was suddenly seized by the arm, and turning, recognized his client, who, with tears in his eyes, exclaimed, "Och, Mither Curran, be me sowl but I'm afther owen you a large debt of gratchitude, for, on me conscience, sir, until I heard your argument I hadn't the schloightest idea of the extint of me injury."

Mr. Speaker, this pretended love for the negro is all sheer hypocrisy. Yet it has been to a certain extent a success. To meet the end in view, the radicals profess an ardent admiration for this inferior race, while in reality they have another object in view. The feeling they exhibit is simulated; it is not love, but hate, deep, persecuting hatred, of the white man of the South. Now that peace has shed her radiance on this favored land, men are found insidiously endeavoring to prevent the speedy reconstruction and reintegration of the country. Men who can see nothing but "loyal blacks and rebel whites" are pursuing a course which in the end will be fatal only to themselves. Day by day their ranks are being thinned. I warn them to listen to the whisperings of wisdom from those noble men of their own party who, like ourselves, would sacrifice everything but their honor to promote harmony in the action of the Government in all its parts, and secure the great end in view, the speedy, effectual, and perfect restoration of the Union. If it be true that the effort of the nation was to suppress rebellion and abolish slavery, then both of these objects have been successfully accomplished. We may cry peace, peace, and yet there is no peace. We have among us certain persons who have attempted to establish a voluntary censorship, and attempt coercion without confidence, and success without deserving it. The honorable gentleman from Illinois, who, I presume, speaks ex cathedra for his associates, expressed the most intense love for the negro, socially, personally, and politically. I must confess he took an ungentle method to prove his attachment by comparison.

The radicals are always inconsistent: those who make the loudest noise are least entitled to consideration. Take a single instance. We were told that the people of Illinois are in favor of unqualified negro suffrage. If the statement had been credited it would have had great weight in the determination of this vexed question. But what are the facts? Some years ago it was made a part of the organic law of that State that no negro should be allowed to reside within the limits of the State. After a test of several years, in 1862 the repeal of that clause was formally submitted to the people, who determined to retain it by a majority of more than one hundred thousand votes, and it is to-day part of the fundamental law of the State of Illinois. In all kindness I suggest to my honorable friend that he has mistaken the proper forum for his eloquence, and that it is inappropriate in him to undertake to shape and temper the humane policy of the people of the United States in regard to the negro until his record of humanity is of a higher grade than that of the State whose policy he assumes to reflect. I can well understand why such States as Iowa and Maine, for example, where there are comparatively few negroes, might vote in favor of negro suffrage; their political status could in nowise be affected by the change; but this question assumes a phase of increased gravity when applied to States in which the blacks and whites are nearly equal in numbers, and especially in those States where the black population far outnumber the whites. This proposition at the present time, when we have just emerged from a rebellion of four years' duration, demands our gravest attention. Besides, its consideration is greatly intensified by the existence of the fact that not one of the States recently in rebellion has a vote or a voice upon this floor. We should therefore do well to pause before we undertake to invert the order of nature and civilization.

It requires care, time, and a matured, deliberate, and thorough consideration. I warn the members of this House against the fatal consequences of inconsiderate action; and in this connection let me remark, that I repel the assumption of the radicals that the Democratic party oppose universal negro suffrage because the negro's skin is black. The charge manifestly emanates from a vagrant intellect and a vicious heart. On the contrary, we place our opposition to universal negro suffrage upon two distinct and tenable grounds, namely: first, as a question of time it is inappropriate and fraught with imminent danger; and lastly, relying upon the statement of our opponents that it was a part of the policy of their hard taskmasters to keep their slaves in utter ignorance as one of their means of security against loss, the Democratic party place their hostility to the measure upon their utter want of capacity to employ an intelligent judgment in the exercise of the elective franchise. If our adopted citizens are required to undergo a five years' probation before they can vote, with how much greater force may the objection be applied to those who never read or wrote a line, and perhaps were never off the plantation on which they were born. The body has been emancipated, but time alone can burst the chains of mental bondage.

But, sir, I now turn to the other branch of the subject. Let those who idolize the negro, care for the object of their idolatry as best they may. I intend here to look after the welfare of another race, commonly called white men. Do not let us exhaust all our sympathy on an inferior race. There is legislation before us that demands our earnest consideration and prompt attention. How stands the account betwixt us and the remnant of that noble band through whom the national life was preserved and the negro emancipated? I answer, it is largely against us on the score of justice and humanity. What have we done for the mutilated men who go about our streets upon crutches, with empty sleeves, and entirely disabled and unfit for active labor? Nothing, absolutely nothing. Sir, four years ago, the men who composed the Union Army sprang to their arms upon the first intimation that the Republic was in danger, and generously imperiled their lives, for, they loved their country. They left comfortable and happy homes to endure the pains and privations of the field. Time flew on. The brave "boys in blue" fought manfully, and through their efforts, thank God, the Union has been preserved. Sir, this is not all. Away upon the many fields of strife countless thousands of these brave and gallant men now sleep the last sleep of death. Martyrs to liberty, they died nobly in the cause of freedom, and now rest from their labors in the sweet repose of the silent tomb.

"On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead."

Alas! we can only extend to them the tribute of grateful memories. To those who yet survive, mangled and mutilated as they are, how changed the scene! Those once happy homes are cheerless and lonely; where once all was peace and comfort and happiness, there now only remain destitution, poverty, and want. The stately mansion and the lowly cabin alike share the common fate. The somber weed, the blanched face, and the feeble gait, indicate too surely the presence of "a stricken fold." This is the melancholy picture; let it be ours to surround it with the framework of appropriate legislation. I am sure that He who "tempers the wind to the shorn lamb" now calls upon us to cheer the lonely and the comfortless, and with the outpourings of grateful hearts let us extend to our brave defenders the fragrant incense of a nation's praise. Sir, I have done.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE, announcing that he had approved and signed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 28) in relation to the Industrial Exposition at Paris, France; also an act (H. R. No. 58) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint assistant assessors of internal revenue; also a joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) granting certain public property to the Soldiers' Orphans' Home of Iowa. He also delivered to the House a message in writing.

PRESIDENT JUAREZ OF MEXICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 22d instant, requesting the communication of any correspondence or other information in regard to a demonstration by the Congress of the United States of Colombia, or any other country, in honor of President Juarez, of the republic of Mexico, I transmit herewith a report from the Acting Secretary of State, with the papers by which it was accompanied.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1866.

Mr. BANKS. I move that this communication be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ST. PAUL AND LAKE SUPERIOR RAILROAD.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Paul to Lake Superior, approved May 5, 1864; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NAVIGATION OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER, ETC.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio rivers and their navigable tributaries; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MINES AND MINING.

Mr. BIDWELL moved that the Committee on Mines and Mining be discharged from the further consideration of the communication from the miners' convention of California, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a statement of disbursements of the contingent fund of that Department, in accordance with the act of Congress of August 26, 1842; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. WILLIAM L. HERNDON.

Mr. BROOKS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Mrs. William L. Herndon; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BROOKS asked for the immediate consideration of the bill.

No objection was made.

The bill was read at length. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a copy-right to be issued to Mrs. William L. Herndon, her heirs, assigns, and legal representatives, for the term of fourteen years, granting the exclusive right to republish a book entitled "Exploration of the Valley of the Amazon," heretofore published by order of Congress.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROOKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIANS IN DAKOTA TERRITORY.

Mr. BURLEIGH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas several citizens of Dakota Territory have been either murdered or maimed and had their property stolen and destroyed by the hostile Sioux Indians who were concerned in the late Minnesota massacre, either at the time of or since that sad occurrence; and whereas the hostile bands of Indians known as the Sisseton, Wah-pa-ton, Medawakanton, and Wah-pa-koota bands of Dakota Indians were, in opposition to the wishes of the citizens of Dakota Territory, forced into said Territory, in consequence of which act these outrages have been committed upon the unarmed and defenseless citizens of that Territory: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the justice and propriety of reporting a bill providing for the appointment of a commissioner, whose duty it shall be to determine the amount of depredations by said Indians upon the citizens of said Territory, and of recommending an appropriation sufficient to pay the same.

ARMS FOR DAKOTA TERRITORY.

Mr. BURLEIGH also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing in the hands of the Governor of Dakota Territory two thousand stand of arms, and the necessary ammunition, to be used by citizens of said Territory who may organize for defense against the hostile Indians of the Northwest.

SEEDS FOR DISTRIBUTION.

Mr. WRIGHT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be directed to inquire what, if any, amount over and above the usual appropriation will be necessary for the adequate supply of seeds to be distributed among the farmers of the country by the Department of Agriculture, with liberty to present the result of their inquiry by bill or otherwise.

RAILROAD COMMUNICATION WITH THE WEST.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution, and to have them considered at this time:

Whereas it is the interest of this Government that the means of communication between its metropolis and the seat of its power in the great West should be as direct and immediate as the topography of the intervening country will allow; and whereas it is represented that the route indicated by the Father of his Country as the most obvious and practicable for the establishment of this connection between the eastern sea-board and the great valley of the Mississippi, of which the prospective necessity was present to his far-seeing eye, has been obstructed by hostile State legislation in the interest of a rival corporation of the State of Pennsylvania: Therefore,

Resolved, That it be referred to a special committee of nine members, to be appointed by the Chair, to inquire whether the commercial, postal, or military necessities of the country require the construction of a continuous line of railroad between the seat of Government and the great States and Territories of the West and Northwest, so as to reach the head-waters of the Ohio river by the most direct and practicable route; how much still remains to be done to establish and complete such connection; whether any obstacles have been interposed by the Legislatures of the State or States through which the same would pass, and what means are within the powers of Congress to remove such obstacles, if any, and to facilitate the construction of such a road as the wants of the Government or the convenience of the traveling and trading public may require, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BOYER objected.

And then, on motion of Mr. THAYER, (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 27, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced that the House was in session for the purpose of hearing speeches, to be delivered as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon the President's message, and that no other business would be in order, except the reception of messages from the Senate and motions to adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JENCKES. Is it in order, Mr. Speaker, to ask leave of absence?

The SPEAKER, pro tempore. The Chair thinks that that is in order.

Mr. JENCKES. Then I ask leave of absence for the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. WARNER.

Leave was granted.

Mr. DRIGGS asked and obtained leave of absence for himself for three days of next week.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The House, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, resumed the consideration of the President's annual message, on which Mr. SMITH was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMITH resumed the floor, and concluded his remarks begun on Friday, the 19th instant. [The entire speech will be published in the Appendix.]

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to the question of reconstruction. In the very opening of my remarks I will say that on the present occasion I must firmly decline to yield the floor to any interruption whatever; and this not from the slightest possible feeling of discourtesy toward any gentleman who may desire such a privilege, but because of the entire newness of my position in this or any other legislative body, and because at the present stage of the debate, when no particular measure is under consideration, but only general principles out of which measures must come, I prefer to select my own undisturbed line of march over the wide field of argumentation that is now opened up, and to marshal in unbroken order the great principles which in my judgment ought to control the action of this House and this Congress. Though I shall have occasion to deal plainly with great public facts and principles of conduct, I beg gentlemen on the other side of this House to accept my sincere assurance that I am very anxious to cultivate the most kindly personal relations toward every gentleman on this floor, and shall not, therefore, transcend the limits of parliamentary propriety and the true uses of debate, by passing from principles and groups and masses to the disconnected treatment of individuals. I will add that I shall speak only for myself, and with that untrammelled freedom from authority and influence which I think appropriate to a direct Representative of the people in this Government. If in this my unpracticed judgment shall lead me into error, I only will be to blame for that error.

To proceed at once, sir, toward the heart of the general question. In one very important aspect of the case, my analysis only enables me to discover two fundamentally distinct ideas of policy so far as yet manifested in this Hall: the one is firmly adhered to by the small Democratic opposition which the loyal country has returned, and is also apparently favored by a few members of the overwhelming Union majority on this floor; the other draws to it the support of the great body of that Union majority. The one idea is that, in the very important business of restoring the revolted States to their complete normal position in the Union, the Congress of the United States has now nothing else to do but to judge, each House for itself, "of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] informs us that "all but this has been done in the exercise of his (the President's) functions, and in the performance of his duties as President of the United States and as Commander-in-Chief of their armies;" while the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] inquires, "Why refer this question to a joint committee of the Senate and House when the Constitution provides that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members?" And thus, sir, the voice from this side the Hall, and that of the Opposition member from Ohio, blend in perfect accord upon the main point, and unite in the assertion of the idea that this, the first American Congress that assembles after the crushing of the rebellion, shall be dwarfed to the mere consideration of work fitly springing from a committee on elections; signaling its diminished existence by canvassing poll-books, inspecting certificates, and inquiring after the personal status of a few gentlemen claiming seats on this floor. "Only this and nothing more!" That, indeed, would be a big performance on the part of the law-making power of the Government of the United States at a time like this—covering it undoubtedly with a glory that would become historic.

The other fundamental idea is, in my judgment, infinitely more in keeping with the just prerogatives of Congress, with the demands of the people, and the imperative requirements of patriotic duty. It is that the Legislature of the Government, which is the constitutional source of all national law in the Republic, should go far behind the comparatively trivial, surface business of elections and personal qualifications, consider well the state of the Union in reference to the late rebellion, judge what further or safer precedent guarantees are necessary to the assured safety of the nation and provide for the same, admit no member from any State which has been in rebellion until after these guarantees shall be executed, and then, in conformity with law, declaring such State again entitled to representation. Such, sir, is my conception of the function and duty of Congress in the present emergency.

The very statement of these two opposing views shows on which side is the weight of reason; the one affirming, the other denying, that the loyal people of this nation, through their Representatives in Congress, should be the judge of what great and just guarantees will make them secure in the future before readmitting to full power in the system those States which have just now laid upon our shoulders three thousand millions of debt, and, in their mad effort to blot this country from the political map of the world, filled the grave-yards of the North and the battle-fields of the South with the molding bodies of the patriot children of the Republic! Sir, if there ever was or ever can be upon earth a case, calling in the name of outraged right and humanity for complete and perfect security for the future, before reclothing with power the now paralyzed arm of treason still red with blood scarcely dry, this is that case! And, sir, when we reflect that these guarantees must consist of civil measures, laws, constitutional or statutory, I undertake to say that the assertion, direct or by implication, that Congress is not the proper judge of what they should embrace, is one of the most monstrous, indefensible, and pernicious assumptions that ever found expression in this Hall or out of it. How any mind of legal training, any mind acquainted with the great and prominent constitutional landmarks that separate the powers of this Government, could come to entertain such an idea, I am totally at a loss to conceive, except it be upon the hypothesis that the Executive, having justly and wisely wielded the gigantic powers of war, and having thereby for a time fixed upon itself the peculiar and concentrated attention of the people, it should now, after the last gun is fired, after the last armed foe has surrendered, yield to the force of habit, and throw the shadow of the executive will over an immense field of law and civil jurisdiction!

Sir, I am not advised that it is the purpose of our able and patriotic Executive to stand upon any such assumption. But the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] has seen fit to maintain that the whole subject of precedent requisitions belongs solely to the President. In reply to a question upon the very point he says:

"My impression is that these requisitions are made a part of the terms of surrender we have a right to demand at the hands of the defeated insurgents, and that it belongs therefore to the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, to make them, and to fix the limits as to what they shall embrace."

To my mind the concluding part of this statement presents an amazing proposition. Very true, sir, we may make proper political requisitions a part of the terms of surrender and cession we have a right to demand of the defeated insurgents; but it is not true, that the military surrender of men in arms, munitions of war, flags, and cannon, and the political surrender, involving permanent legal security for the future, are objects belonging to the same class, and amenable therefore to the same ultimate judgment and prevision. That, sir, is bad logic which commences with bad classification, forcing totally unlike things together and grouping them under the comprehension of the same particular idea. And I submit that no two objects can be more distinct in their form and in their substance, than a military surrender on the one hand, and subsequent civil and political enactments in the nature of guarantee on the other. Most obviously the one appertains to the Executive; most obviously the other appertains to the Legislative: each in its own proper sphere having no limitation but that imposed by the Constitution. What, sir, are the contents of a military surrender? Things military in their nature. What are the contents of a political surrender? Things political in their nature. Oil and water will no more mix in one than will these two objects obey the voice of the honorable gentleman from New York, and marshal themselves together under the solitary control of the executive will. As well might Congress have undertaken to settle the military surrender of the rebel armies, "and fix the limit as to what it shall embrace," as for the Executive—in accordance with the ideas of the gentleman from New York—to assume definite control of the intervening civil policy which shall precede the return of the rebel States to full power in the Union, and "fix the limits" as to what this civil policy shall embrace.

The very truth is, sir, that the putting down the rebellion and the final restoration of a normal order called for the exhibition of two great agencies, essentially different in their character—the powers of war to crush the rebel forces in the field and on the sea, and after that, a civil policy prescribing a secure basis of pacification for the country. The first of these agencies consisted of the Army, the Navy, military material, and supplies. These were raised and provided by Congress, and then wielded by the President as Commander-in-Chief. The executive idea entered predominantly into this great agency of war, because the executive will was the more immediate source of the battles, the sieges, and the grand military and naval movements of the conflict. The work of this agency is substantially accomplished. The other controlling agency consists of great pacifying measures of security to the country, leading the way to the ultimate restoration of the revolted States to full and equal power in the Government. The legislative idea enters predominantly into this agency, and its work yet remains in great part to be done. That the first of these agencies should swallow up the second, undertake to judge of its work, and oust it of its jurisdiction, ought never to be claimed or defended by an American statesman!

But, sir, to place this matter beyond all controversy, at least in the forum of reason and law, let us inquire with more particularity what are and ought to be the elements of that civil policy which should go before and inaugurate such return of the late rebel States to power. There first is the required constitutional amendment abolishing slavery throughout the jurisdiction of the Republic, and giving Congress power to make the same effectual by law. That was deemed one very essential condition precedent. What has or ever had the Executive to do with the initiation, the judging, or making of this amendment? The Constitution expressly confers on Congress by a two-thirds majority the power to propose, and on the States by a three-fourths majority the power to ratify, all constitutional amendments. Here, then, in this great part of the pacifying policy, the Executive nowhere appears, but only Congress and the States.

Again, another precedent condition is that the revolted States should each present a government republican in form, and of this Congress is the exclusive judge. In the great Rhode Island case, (Luther vs. Borden and others,) decided in 1849, the Supreme Court of the United States—considering of that section of the Constitution which provides for the guarantee of a republican form of government—uses the following language:

"Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the existing one in a State. For as the United States guaranty to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority, and its decision is binding on every other department of the Government."

Thus the opinion of the court is that the Constitution devolves it upon Congress to look at the government of a State and "determine whether it is republican or not;" and further, that the decision of Congress upon the point "is binding upon every other department of the Government." But aside from what the court has said, it is apparent from the very nature of the thing, that the great civil and political question—big with the rights of the southern people, white and black—involved in the determination of what is or is not a republican State, belongs essentially to the legislative branch of the Government. Of course, in the execution of this guarantee affirmative legislation by Congress would, as in other cases, have to be accompanied by the sanction of the President.

Again: there are at least four other guarantees of safety and justice to the loyal people who have saved this country at so great a cost of blood and treasure, every one of which should, in my judgment, be incorporated in the Constitution of the United States before admitting representation from any State which has been in rebellion, and from all consideration, authority, or judgment concerning which, the Executive is discharged, as I have explained, by the Constitution itself: First, an amendment placed in the fundamental law of the whole land, putting it above all question and all cavil, that no State has a right to secede from the Union at her sovereign will and pleasure. Secondly, an amendment guarding against all fluctuations of time and party, all possible relapses of corruption, giving the people of the Union and the people of every State perfect repose, perfect security against the possibility of ever being burdened with the payment of any portion of that enormous rebel debt which was contracted in the satanic effort to lay the Republic in ruins. Thirdly, making representation, and exact consequent power in this Government, bear an exact proportion to the measure of political justice practiced by each State in the Union—I mean an amendment apportioning representation in Congress, with proper guards, according to the number of persons who are represented in each State respectively—thereby protecting the loyal people of the nation from the crying injustice and palpable danger of restoring the late rebel communities, as proposed by some, not to equal rights in this Union, sir, as is delusively said, but on a basis giving to the recent traitors of the South, man for man, nearly double the political power in the popular branch of the Government, and over the future destinies of the Republic, which belongs to the loyal citizens of the country who have saved it from destruction at the hands of these very traitors. Fourthly, an amendment forever excluding all rebels from the high offices, civil and military, under this Government—thereby giving bloodless satisfaction to justice, and a deadly blow to the aristocracy out of which the rebellion sprang.

Every one of these suggested amendments is not only needed as a means of giving security, repose, and satisfaction to the country, but, what is more and higher, they are all inherently right. You can look an honest man straight in the eyes while demanding them, sir. Is it not right that a final and unmistakable constitutional quietus should be given to both of those twin monstrosities, divinity of slavery and ascendancy of State over national sovereignty, which were blown up together by political demagogues and a prostituted clergy, until they finally exploded in wrath and blood and treason through the land? Is it not right that a like quietus should be placed upon the rebel debt; that the loyal people of the nation, North and South, should have perfect security against the corrupting power and contingent danger of that debt? And is it not a mockery and an insult to tell them they should take any risk whatever when they can so easily and so justly guard against all risk by amending the fundamental law before admitting the ex-rebel communities to power? If this is not done I regard it as eminently probable, if not morally certain, that the rebel States, under the old ruling class, will, each for itself, burden the labor of its poor people, white and black, loyalist and traitor, with the payment of the rebel debt it has contracted; thus grinding with cruel injustice the loyalists of the South, and greatly impairing the ability of that section to contribute its just share in the liquidation of our legitimate national debt. That statesman assumes a fearful responsibility, sir, who would leave the nation, and especially the producing laborers of the South, exposed to such a danger as this! But, further, is it not right that the ex-rebel of Tennessee or Carolina, Virginia or Mississippi, should be restored to no more political weight in the Government he has striven so hard to destroy, than is enjoyed by the northern patriot who has given all that was mortal of his son to some battle-trench of the South, or southern grave-yard where starved men were buried? And is it not right that the nation should smite with the voice of its fundamental law, as utterly and forever unworthy of its trust, those ringleaders who betrayed it so infamously and to such deadly hurt?

Send these questions to the country, sir. Send them to New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, whose volunteer levies gauged the high-water mark of human heroism upon the immortal field of Gettysburg; send them to Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and the Northwest, whose invincible legions, abler than those of Alexander or Caesar, cleared the banks of the great river to the Gulf, stormed the mountain barriers of Chattanooga, and swept in a circle of fire and blood sheer through the heart of the opprobrious confederacy; send them, sir, to the whole loyal country, whose grand host, marshaled for the final conflict from every loyal State, bore the banner of Liberty and Union triumphantly through that Titanian struggle of the Wilderness, and, though ninety thousand brave comrades fell from their ranks, planted it at last, amid the wild plaudits of the nation, amid the reeling of steeples, the clangor of bells, and the boom of artillery, over Spottswood, Castle Thundie, and Libby Prison! Ask these people who have thus given five hundred and twenty-five thousand of their strong sons to the jaws of death in order to rescue the Republic from the parricidal hand of treason—ask them whether they will now have any skin-deep tinkering of statesmanship, any paltering in a double sense, any uncertainty and danger in regard to the great and vital and plainly just points of security I have named; and, sir, an answer shall come back to you which will startle you into a realizing sense of the grand purpose, the high moral power which lies locked up in the great loyal heart of this country! That purpose is strong, because it is allied to patriotism, justice, humanity; because it recognizes progress as well as order; because it is the will of God, expressed in historic form, and working out the historic ends of the Republic. It will not be thwarted of these ends, sir! No power in the nation, official or other, is strong enough to stand before it and turn it back. It demands that the old reign of brotherly love based upon infernal injustice shall cease, and cease effectually. It demands that the character of the American citizen shall no more be degraded nor his patriotism corrupted by being required to surrender his conscience as a peace-offering to either an imperious or a suing aristocracy of class. It demands that the honor of the nation shall not be soiled with base ingratitude by abandoning our southern allies who have done so much by strong arms and patriotic sympathy to turn the scale of the conflict in our favor—abandoning them, sir, to the bullet, the knife, the halter, the scourge, the cruel code, the enforced ignorance, and compulsory poverty which the bitter "grudge" that is owed them will so surely bring upon their unprotected heads.

The loyal people of the nation feel, sir, and they know, that if one Curtius leaping into the chasm was an offering propitious to the gods, giving back solid earth for men to stand upon, this mighty holocaust of more than half a million of lives ought to have the moral and political consequence of giving to them and their posterity forever a firm and assured ground of justice and safety to stand upon! They feel, sir, and they are proud of the fact, that their grand army of citizen soldiery has covered itself with imperishable glory, by executing the most prodigious military performance recorded in history. They now look to their civil representatives, and demand the exhibition of a statesmanship which history will not blush to record in contrast with its great military antecedent—a statesmanship which shall inaugurate the new and better order, by first gathering up the most vital results of the war and concreting them as the expressed will of the nation, some in the fundamental law of the Republic, and others in great and stable statutes of liberty. When this is done, and not before, let the late rebel States resume full political power in the Government.

Some one has said that America produces the largest rivers, the handsomest women, and the most impudent men anywhere to be found on the face of the whole earth. It is true, indeed, sir, as to the impudence. If there is one postulate of common sense and common honesty and common decency which more plainly than another is seen to be true at the first glance, it is that the tried and proved friends of the Government, who have stayed it up from overthrow during this terrible war, have now a right to set the national house in safe order, before admitting to power and influence over that house, those who have just now stolen its treasure, captured its sentinels, plundered its arsenals, fired its rooms, blown up its buttresses, and covered its wide halls and long corridors deep with the blood of its loyal defenders! And now, that these mischievous rioters have been quelled and disarmed by the friends of the house, that they should expect, or dream, or imagine that they have any other right but to take a back seat until those friends have time to fix up the house for their proper future accommodation, is an instance of impudence having no parallel in profane and only one in sacred history—and that was when the devil extended an invitation to the Lord to fall down and worship him!

That preliminary fixing-up of the house—in addition to what has already been done—consists essentially in my judgment of the five fundamental things which I have named. Let us look at these a little more in detail, and see more particularly what relation they sustain to the honor, the sense of justice, and the future repose and security of the nation; and, with a view to being strictly practical in our conduct, let us keep in view the probable voice that will come back from the country when it comes to be interrogated on each of these points respectively.

First, the guarantee of a republican form of government, which, as we have seen, belongs to Congress to judge of and determine. Will any one question that the loyal people of the whole country wish to have this guarantee executed before admitting the revolted States to political power? Do they not wish that these States shall come with republican governments? Is it not inherently right that they should be required so to come? And is that a republican State which is based upon a fraction of even its white population? But especially, and more directly and certainly to the point, is that a republican government which signally fails to protect the great right of liberty which has been conferred upon one half of its people by the sovereign will of the nation? Certainly, sir, it is not; and right here comes in the power of Congress to guard and make real the precious boon of civil freedom which has been pledged to the colored people of the South, in consideration of their great service to the Government in its time of need. I say nothing, sir, of the political right of suffrage in itself. For the purpose of assuming a position of impregnable practical strength, upon which all Union men unite, I limit myself to the very terms of the bond, and say that the loyal people of the country stand pledged to secure civil liberty to the colored man of the South, and that they demand an efficient execution of that pledge as part of the basis of reconstruction.

Secondly, a constitutional amendment declaring in literal terms the indissolubility of the Union. Is there not a real need of this? Are the opinions that a State has a sovereign right to secede, and that the Constitution is broken by coercing it back, quite given up in our land? Far from it, sir. The number of persons in the North who held and hold one or both of these positions is very large, while in the South both opinions, on the point of very right, are probably as prevalent as they ever were. They mourn "a just but lost cause." They admit that the Government had more men, more resources, and a longer purse. But men, resources, and money, are measures of force and not of right. So the inward conviction of the heart remains unchanged. Now, sir, upon this great point of nationality, we want the victory of force to draw with it the logical consequence of passing on to a victory of permanent, quieting law, so literally certain that no future Calhoun, Davis, or Yancey will be able to mislead any portion of the people. When we consider that by and by we may number a hundred States; when we take into view our vast prospective population; when we reflect upon the climatic and other natural causes which will tend to segregate in parts a dense population extending over such an immense area, I warn you, sir, that in the great future which awaits us, we shall need a Constitution whose language speaks nationality in terms so plain as to preclude the possibility of misinterpretation. Now, before readmitting the seceding communities, who asserted so mightily the right of secession, is the time to secure that amendment. Afterward it will be too late forever; the golden opportunity will be lost; the bitter heresy of State secession, now cloven to the ground by the scythe of war, will spring up anew from its unextirpated and living roots, and return to plague again our public life.

Thirdly, a constitutional amendment tabooing the rebel debt as to State and nation. Who can doubt that this form of security is really needed? I have said already, and it appears to me entirely obvious, that the rebel States, if unrestrained by the Constitution of the Union, will, as soon as they get full control of themselves, set aside the little arrangements which have been made at the point of the bayonet, and burden their people with the great debts they have contracted for the overthrow of this Government—thus absorbing their revenues in the payment of these debts, and so crippling their ability to aid the exchequer of the nation. Who can doubt that the one hundred thousand ex-rebels of Tennessee, opposed to her forty thousand loyalists, will, when left to themselves, and unrestrained by the national Constitution, take charge of that State bodily? And so, and worse, if possible, of the other seceded States.

Neither, sir, do the people feel so secure as they wish against this rebel debt in a national sense. "What!" it will come to be said after awhile, "tax us to pay your debt, to put large sums of money annually into the pockets of your people, and you refuse to help us to pay our debt, which grew out of the same squabble, which was honestly contracted, and is justly due! And we equal States in the Union! Call you this equality between members of the same family? We getting all the shearing and you all the wool!" Arguments not a whit sounder have, on more than one occasion, controlled the action of a once dominant party in this country; and when we recall the final nether swoop of that party, when, compassing not merely the imposition of a wicked debt, but the very life of the nation, one half of it rushed frantically at the throat of the Republic, while a large portion of the other half lay like a threatening thunder-cloud upon the North, growing in sympathy with treason; and when we contemplate the assemblage of their wise men, standing upon the banks of the great western lake, and crying with a loud voice, "Great is Babylon! great is Babylon! her proud towers will not be brought down by the battering-ram of war!" and this just before those towers were in fact laid prone by the stalwart blows of Grant and Sherman; and now, when we look at these same wise men on the one hand, and these disarmed traitors on the other, and see that, like two long-separated lovers, they are fairly glowing with eagerness to rush into each other's embrace, we are admonished that it is prudent to postpone this embrace until we shall have taken ample surety that the result of it cannot be another spawn of plagues upon the nation!

Fourthly, the suggested amendment making representation in Congress correspond with the measure of suffrage behind it. This, or substantially this, I regard as a measure not only perfectly just in itself, but as one of the most potent agencies that can be wielded by the friends of progress. Who can stand before the people of the North and tell them that the late rebel communities ought, as a matter of right, to have between thirty and forty Representatives in Congress upon no better basis than the unvoting and therefore unrepresented colored people of the South? Let this be changed, by all means; so that a State shall either allow its people to vote or else not have them counted in the basis of her representation. Sir, by this sign we conquer! By this sign we move forward the whole column of civilization! For thus we make not only the stars to fight against Sisera, but set Satan to the work of casting out Satan. Would you have power in this Republic, over whose capitoline dome towers the goddess of Liberty as a grand and beautiful symbol of the rights of man? Be just, be humane, and incorporate the great principles of true democracy in your State. You do not wish to do this? Then submit to have your power shorn to the exact measure of your justice. Thus, sir, we have a mechanism by which, placing our lever on the fulcrum of selfishness, we pry the whole man upward. Thus we supply an alembic, by which prejudice is dissolved, humanity quickened, and a whole brood of old barbarisms transmuted into new and beautiful elements of civilization. The poor, the little, the despised and downtrodden would then take on a new value to society, and would consequently be more respected and better treated than ever before. Say not that such an amendment would be odious, as placing a recognition of class distinction in the fundamental law of the Republic. You know that distinction already exists in fact, and that the practical tendency of the amendment would be to remove it; so that the objection not only sticks in the bark, but breaks the faith to the heart while keeping it to the ear.

Finally, the suggested amendment excluding rebels forever from all the high offices of honor or profit under the Government of the United States. The value of such an amendment would be great. As I have suggested, it would furnish a large, humane, and bloodless satisfaction to justice. I have heard much said about making treason odious. The adoption of such an amendment would be doing something to the purpose in that direction. I will say, sir, that I will hiss no man on in the scent of blood. I am not strong on hanging. Neither am I very strong on confiscation, though willing to do a reasonable thing in that way. I look rather to the application of great principles, of unquestionable justice and humanity, giving large satisfactions, operating upon large masses, removing torpid and brutal social obstructions, and helping society on in its troubled and benighted march to the realization of those better things which I devoutly believe God has in store for it. And I say emphatically, that in my judgment such an amendment would be a very potent means of breaking down that torpid and brutal social obstruction of class rule and aristocracy in the South, out of which came the rebellion, and which is still the tormenting evil of the Republic. Would you be humane to the great mass of the southern people, white and black? Wrench the scepter of power over this Government, at least, from hands which have only ruled to curse and to ruin. Is there not blood enough on those hands to work a forfeiture of right to the scepter? Besides, sir, the loyal people of the country, North and South, want permanent, reliable security that their eyes shall never behold that insufferable spectacle, some Robert E. Lee from Virginia, some Wade Hampton from South Carolina, some Jacob Thompson from Mississippi, some Gideon J. Pillow, or Fort Pillow Forrest from Tennessee, walking into the other end of the Capitol or into this Hall to make laws for the people of the United States! That, sir, ought to be made an impossible thing forever, and the only way to do it is to place the prohibition of it in the Constitution, high above the unstable security of a mere statute which is subject to be set aside at any moment. My strong impression is, that if this is not done before admitting these communities to power again, it will not be long before we shall see the floors of these legislative Halls speckled over with generals and colonels who won the popularity which elevated them to office by leading on the serried rebel column, under a strange and detested flag, to the slaughter of the patriot sons of the Republic! Sir, the very bones of these heroic slain would rise up from the fields of carnage where they fell, and reproach us for the infamy of so base a wrong to the martyred dead! While their fathers, their mothers, their widows, and their orphan children would point the finger of scorn and cry "Shame! shame!" with an emphasis more blasting than the curse of the weird witch, because made pungent by the justice of God!

Look, sir, at the men who have already been elected, as it is called, by most of these communities! Look at the message of the so-called Governor Perry, of South Carolina, arguing that the statute alluded to is unconstitutional and ought to be repealed, and openly confessing that the men returned by that State could not, without flat perjury, take the oath we have all here taken! Read, for you may, from the Richmond Whig of the 21st ultimo, that—"In spite of the late defeat of the Democracy in Ohio and Pennsylvania, the respect and confidence of the southern people in that party is as great as it ever was." "They know full well that if there was a Democratic majority in Congress the congressional test oath would be swept away;"

thus ushering upon these floors as law-makers for loyal men, women, and children, the ring-leaders of the late bloody and infernal rebellion against country and against liberty! And that this opinion of the northern Democracy on the part of the ex-rebels is correct, is proved by the fact that the Representatives of that party upon this floor have already, at this very session, voted nearly unanimously to lay on the table a resolution asserting the binding force of that statute! We want a constitutional barrier, sir, against this impending irruption of rebel celebrities into the chief seats of the Republic, which they have been unable to subvert by stealth, fraud, and perjury, or to overthrow by armed force in the field. Sir, my sense of magnanimity would impel me to pass by another way, and decline to speak thus of a vanquished adversary, were it not that my sense of right is outraged by that evil conjunction of stars in one quarter of our heaven which threatens to throw away the hard-earned fruits of this bloody war, and, after the fashion of the old, miserable, lowering-down compromises of the past, to give to the nation, under the name of a quieting panacea, a swash that will sicken the stomachs of the people, leave "sour-eyed disdain" to rankle in their hearts, and to ripen, it may be, after another cycle of angry unrest, into another purifying cataclysm of blood! Now that Providence and the strong arms of brave men have laid bare the living rock of righteousness, hard by the weltering sloughs of injustice through which the nation has struggled, let us, in God's name, hail with great joy the high privilege of placing our feet firmly upon that rock, remain in the mire who will! Now that that old Rookery of Barbarism, spanning erewhile our whole concave—filled with all abominations—crawling creatures not a few—peeping and muttering creatures ugly as those seen by Dante perched in the infernal wood—and sending from its high places doleful notes of command across the night, marshaling the nation down, down to the abyss!—now that this obscene old Rookery has been laid wide open by the avenging sword of the Lord, sweeping in fiery circles through its "adder dens" and its foul roosts, thus filling earth with the hideous hubbub of its scampering inmates, and so, letting in once more the sweet light of the stars by which a righteous nation walks!—let us, I implore you, sir—if we would assert our manhood, if we would be liege to country and humanity, if we would escape the condemnation of future history—guide our footsteps by the light of those stars, and not by the fetid glamour of the dead-lights that hang delusive over the festering rubbish piles and cess-pools of the wrecked iniquity!

Sir, if we think to the bottom of this business I am solemnly convinced that four general things will appear essential: first, that the measures adopted shall give real satisfaction to the loyal heart of the country; secondly, that these measures shall embody the nearest attainable approach to real justice and humanity, whether as applied to the North or the South, the white man or the black, the loyalist or the traitor; thirdly, that these measures shall be such that they shall conspire in their future operation to remove the segregating difference between the North and the South, and thus help us to a Union of affection in place of a Union of force; and fourthly, that these measures shall be deposited in the highest and most stable forms which the nature of each will admit of. Any plan which does not give satisfaction to the loyal people will be a failure. Any plan which does not embody substantial justice and humanity to all will be a failure. Any plan which does not tend to remove differences, and to bring North and South together in better harmony of feeling, will be a failure; and above all, and emphatically, any plan which does not provide for its own concretion, through the expressed will of the nation, in the most permanent and enduring forms of law, will be, in my judgment, not only a failure, but, besides that, a short-sighted and egregious blunder.

Why, sir, this last must be so from the very nature of the case. Here has been an armed controversy between the Government and certain States seeking to overthrow it. The rebellion is suppressed by force, after fighting a hundred bloody battles and loading the people with an immense debt. As a principle it is admitted on all hands, upon this side of the floor, that proper guarantees of security and justice may be required of the defeated party before admitting them to power again. Now I put the question to the unclouded reason of any mind: who on earth should be the custodian of these guarantees—the nation requiring them for its own security, or the defeated party of whom they are required? The nation of course; and to say the offending States should retain custody of them is, in my judgment, the merest mockery and nonsense. Neither is the matter helped by talking about a generous confidence. That, sir, is only a begging of the question, since it is confidence we are seeking to create by taking guarantees which will make us feel secure; and men do not usually attach much confidence to securities not in their own hands nor subject to their own control, but in the hands and under the control of the very parties sought to be bound! To call such a thing a security is to speak in a sense too decidedly Pickwickian to be altogether appropriate in the closing up of this most serious and tragic business. No, sir, the loyal nation should take these securities into its own keeping by placing them in the Constitution, so far as they will severally admit of it.

I think the measures I have suggested will go far toward fulfilling the fundamental conditions I have named. Taken together they will give substantial satisfaction to the loyal people who have saved the country. Then they are all just in themselves; just in their bearing on every class upon which they act. And their joint influence will be to stimulate the true democratic life of the country in all its parts, and thus to narrow the segregating difference between the North and the South. And in addition to all this—keeping in view the necessity of being practical as well as earnest—I am unable to cull from the whole complex assemblage of elements before us any other efficient combination of measures which would be so certain to secure the triumphant sanction of the country. Let them be adopted, sir, before readmitting the rebel States, or either of them, to political power in the Government, and in my opinion they will constitute a basis of pacification upon which the whole country, North and South, will rapidly coalesce into one unbroken nationality of feeling, all loving the common flag of liberty, all contributing to the culture, growth, and grandeur of the great Republic.

And, sir, another advantage is, that these measures present no point upon which a practical difference can arise between the executive and legislative branches of the Government, each acting within the limits plainly prescribed for it by the Constitution. In the first place, the Executive will of course cheerfully approve all legislation which may be involved in the guarantee of republican State governments, and needful and proper to make real the civil liberty which has been pledged to the colored people of the South. And then, as to the four suggested amendments of the Constitution—first, settling secession; second, prohibiting payment of the rebel debt; third, providing a more just basis of representation; and fourth, excluding rebels from all high offices under this Government—I should really suppose his Excellency's personal opinion would favor them all; but, however this may be, nothing can be more certain than it is impossible for his Excellency to have any official opinion on these points, for the reason already stated, that the Constitution takes no notice whatever of the President in providing for its own amendment, but leaves that work wholly and exclusively to Congress and the States. So that, in the execution of the plan suggested, there is not the slightest legitimate room for any jarring between different departments of the Government.

As to the legal relation which the late rebel States sustain and have sustained to the Government, I will next present such of my views as I think have a practical bearing upon powers to be resorted to and measures to be adopted. In the first place, I will say emphatically, this Republic has never been divided. Grotius, writing of the cases where national "jurisdiction and property cease," tells us—

"It may so fall out that what was before but one State may be divided, either by mutual agreement or by force of arms, as the Persian empire was under Alexander's successors. When this happens there will be several sovereignties in the room of one." &c.

This is the exhaustive analysis, sir; a nation may only be divided by peaceable consent, or by force, internal or external. And this is the criterion by which we may know the division has been effected; the emergence of several sovereignties in the room of one. This is so plain in itself that we should have known it quite as well, though Hugo Grotius had never lived or written. Now, has there in fact been, at any time, such an emergence of several sovereignties in the place of one within the confines of the United States and its Territories? It is idle to pretend there has. The government de facto set up by the revolted States was a belligerent but not a sovereign power. It was treated as a belligerent by this Government, and by many if not all the great States of Europe. And it was indeed a gigantic belligerent. But neither this Government nor any State on earth ever recognized it as a sovereign power. Every branch of this Government, executive, legislative, and judicial, persistently asserted the one and undivided sovereignty of the Republic. We must not confound the power exerted by the de facto confederate government with sovereign power. The two things are totally different in law. The one cannot be seen as an existing entity in the family of nations, the other constitutes a member of that family; thus revealing a difference, when viewed from the stand-point of public law, as wide as the difference between that which is and that which is not. So the revolting States did not for a single moment succeed in segregating themselves as a sovereign power.

The exact practical condition of the case, affirmatively stated, appears to me substantially as follows: the word "union" involves a complex, and not a simple idea. As applied to the Territories, this District, the forts, arsenals, and navy-yards of the Government, all of which are said to be in the Union, it includes, first, the sovereign right of eminent domain in the United States over the geographical surfaces of these several objects; and secondly, the right of sovereignty in the United States over all its citizens living on these geographical surfaces. As applied to the States, the term "union" includes not only the two ideas that the General Government has the sovereign right of eminent domain over their entire geographical surface, and the sovereign right of jurisdiction over all its citizens residing on that surface, but also the third idea, that the people of the States, properly constituted as such, have a right to participate in the government of the Union, by sending Representatives and Senators to Congress. Now, be it noted—for the point is vitally important, if we would really understand this vexed imbroglio—be it noted, that of these three cords of relation between the Government on the one hand, and the whole people and terra firma of the Union on the other, the first two are cords of obligation to the United States, while the third is a cord of privilege to the States respectively. The right of eminent domain, and the right of jurisdiction being cords of obligation to the United States, were not snapped by the rebellion. But the right to participate in the government of the Union, being a cord of privilege to the States respectively, was indisputably forfeited and snapped by plunging into open, flagrant war against the Union. This conclusion cannot be denied without abandoning all reason and all principle—without maintaining that at the very time rebel cannon were planted upon the banks of the Potomac, and rebel legions were thundering at the gates of the capital, it was the right of rebel emissaries, masked as legislators of the Union, to step in here and help finish the work of ruin! This no one has been hardy enough and foolish enough to assert. So that this third cord of relation, this privilege of taking part in the government of the Union, was demonstrably snapped by the rebellion. Yet it does not follow that it should remain always, or even for a great while, severed, but only so long as may be necessary to take safe securities for the future, or, as I have said, to put the national house in proper order, before welcoming back those offending communities to the high privilege of again helping to rule a country, which, after doing their very best, they have been unable to destroy. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] wishes to know what clause of the Constitution can be cited justifying this postponement for guarantees. Why, sir, you can scarcely go amiss for them. The clause guarantying a republican government is one. The revolting States, as I have stated and proved, having voluntarily severed the cord of their governing connection with the Union, Congress can, under this clause, look at their existing organizations, and require them to be republican in form; in other words, require them to conform to the Constitution of the Union, before permitting them to resume their cast-off governing relation in the Union. What can possibly be plainer than this? Again, the power which authorizes the suppression of an insurrection carries with it, by necessary implication, the power to restore and to require a safe civil order after the insurrection is suppressed. Is not this intuitively seen to be true? Again, the Constitution authorizes Congress to provide for "the general welfare of the United States;" and what can be more fatally necessary to that welfare than the taking of all proper precautions before again admitting to power those who have so nearly destroyed the very life of the nation? This is not all, but it is enough to show conclusively, that the requirement of these preliminary securities has as strong a foundation in legal right as in common sense and true patriotism.

So far, then, it is entirely certain that by rebelling against the United States the rebel States became detached from their governing position in the Union, and may now be held so until proper measures of future safety can be provided. But did they cease to be States in every sense? In my opinion they clearly did not; and I think we only incur ourselves with useless dead weight by assuming they did. An argument has been derived from the law of nations, and from other sources, by which it is undertaken to be shown that, inasmuch as these States cast off the superior authority of the United States, they thereby lost a vital requisite of State existence, and hence ceased to be States; not in proper relation to the Union, mark you, but ceased to be States absolutely. I will ask whether those thirteen communities, called in our Declaration "the United States of America," ceased to be States by the act of throwing off the superior authority of the mother country? And did the States of Holland cease to be States by the act of repudiating the superior authority of Spain? And did the seven cantons of the Sonderbund cease to be cantons by their reactionary revolt against the Swiss confederacy, similar in so many respects to the late reactionary revolt against this Republic? I will venture to affirm that no historian and no publicist has ever thought so. And I will venture to affirm that the proposition that any State whatever, whether in this Union or elsewhere on earth, ceases totally to be a State by the act of forcibly asserting its allegiance to a new superior authority, has no foundation in public law. Here again, as with the term "Union," it is only necessary to define accurately in order to walk with sure footing. Mr. Justice Story says:

"The word 'State' is used in various senses. In its most enlarged sense it means the people composing a particular nation or community. But there is a more limited sense in which the word is often used, where it expresses the positive actual organization of the legislative, executive, or judicial powers."

Now, it is palpable the revolting States did not cease to be States in the first and larger sense of the word. Their people did not become extinct. Neither did they, by the act of revolting and making war, cease substantively to be States in the more limited sense of the word; for each of them retained a powerful and efficient organization de facto for itself, constituting each of them a State de facto for the time. And that there is such a being as a State de facto known to the language of the law any one may learn by consulting Story. The decision of the Supreme Court in the prize cases, so often cited, gives no countenance to the notion that the whole idea of State was expunged by the rebellion, but expressly recognizes that that idea in some sense must be retained. The court says that "in organizing this rebellion they have acted as States;" that "several of these States have combined to form a confederacy;" that "the ports and territories of each of these States are held in hostility to the General Government." How could the ports and territories of a State be held in hostility when there was not so much as the ghost of a State in the case?

But there is a third definition of a State. It is that complex political being which constitutes a member in proper relations to this Union. And here the integrity of the idea is invaded in the case of the revolted States. The fullness of the idea of a State in this sense involves, first, the performance of all things enjoined by the Constitution; secondly, the abstinence from all things forbidden by the Constitution; and thirdly, the right to participate in the Government of the Union under the Constitution. These States having angrily thrust from them the privilege of helping to govern the Union; having refused to do everything enjoined by the Constitution; and having done everything forbidden by it, even to the waging of a four years' war for the subversion of the Republic, it not only results with crushing conclusiveness, as already stated, that they should not resume governing power until such resumption shall be safe for the country, but it also follows, with equal certainty, that inasmuch as their hostile organizations de facto, State and confederate, have been overthrown by the successful arms of the Republic, this righteous catastrophe left them in the condition of disorganized States. I say, emphatically, disorganized States in the Union and not out of it. This is the position which the common sense of the nation has assigned to these States, and that common sense is of infinitely more worth as a criterion of truth than the unsubstantial subtlety of the metaphysical politicians. Let no one take alarm. These disorganized States, though in the Union, can of course have no political power in the Government until they are properly organized as republican States, with proper guarantees of public safety. And that the common sense of the people is at one with the very law of the case is not only apparent from what has already been said, but results with powerful conclusiveness from that great clause of the Constitution upon which so much reliance is placed: "The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." This guarantee goes to a "State," not to a Territory. It goes to a State "in this Union," not out of it. It contemplates the contingency of a State in the Union being deprived of a republican government, either by the imposition of some other form or by being forcibly disorganized, which last was the case with the eleven revolted States. It then becomes the duty of Congress, as we have seen, to secure to the people of such usurped or disorganized State a republican form of government. The execution of this guarantee, in combination with the amendments I have insisted on, will make the nation secure; and the whole scheme involves nothing which is not just before God and man.

In my judgment, all the revolted States—Tennessee, in common with the rest—should be kept out of the governing power, which they thrust from them in exchange for treason and the sword, until the guarantees I have named shall be ratified by the voice of the nation and conformed to by each of the seceding States. I beg the honorable gentlemen from Tennessee who are claiming seats here to accept my frank word when I say that, without meaning the slightest disrespect to them, I cannot surrender to personal considerations my conviction of duty to country and duty to the loyalists of Tennessee herself. I must look to the future as well as to the present. I must look at Tennessee as well as at the honorable gentlemen who claim to represent her. And from all the lights I now have, my opinion is that if the account should now be closed up with that State, her loyal population would pass under the cruel and grinding yoke of rebel rule.

Sir, on the 23d of last month I addressed certain questions in regard to the status of Tennessee to Hon. W. G. Brownlow, Governor of that State. I will say that I believe Governor Brownlow, in view of their loyal character, desires the admission of the Tennessee delegation. The following, however, is that portion of his answer in full which discloses the internal condition of Tennessee, and which is responsive to my questions:

KNOXVILLE, TENNESSEE, January 1, 1866.

Hon. J. BAKER: * * * * * As regards the state of things in the South, they are bad enough in all conscience, and most of the loyalty professed is with a view to obtain pardon, get property back, and again get into office. There is a better state of feeling in Tennessee than in any other southern State, Kentucky not excepted, and we have great room for improvement in both Middle and West Tennessee. East Tennessee is all right, and has been from the outset of this rebellion. I give it as my candid opinion that if the military forces were all withdrawn from Tennessee the Legislature would at once be dispersed by a rebel mob. Out of six daily papers in Nashville, four of them are rebel; while the people are more than two thirds on the rebel side. Rebel grand juries are indicting Federal soldiers and officers in Middle Tennessee, and either binding them over to court in heavy bonds, or casting them into prison for executing orders given them by our generals, as far back as the days of Rosecrans and Stone River! And many of the rebels now speak out openly and say Union men and Yankees shall not live in the country.

As regards the negroes, they would have hard times if the military were withdrawn. When they are tried in our courts they are, if convicted, sent to the pententiary for the longest terms the law allows. In some instances they are sent for several years, when one month's confinement in a county jail would be equal to the offense. I have had occasion to pardon on several such cases. Nor are white loyalists treated any better at the hands of rebel juries. Our judges are loyal men, but rebel juries run over their charges, and the law. I am speaking of Middle and West Tennessee, whose rebel population, with here and there exceptions, are as disloyal as they were in 1861. Other Tennesseans, loyal and intelligent, would give you a more favorable account of things. I cannot conscientiously do so. I believe the whole South is full of rebellion, and that the rebels are seeking to accomplish by legislation and through Congress what they failed to do upon the field of carnage—destroy the Government. And should this Legislature of ours adjourn without giving us the right sort of franchise law, the next General Assembly will be rebel, and will repeal all the laws this one has enacted. The next congressional delegation will be rebel, and our Senators will be instructed to resign. And some such man as General Forrest will be elected Governor.

Assuming the restraints of the General Government are all to be removed from Tennessee, you ask me if northern school teachers would be allowed to educate negroes? I answer, no, not in Middle and West Tennessee. In two cases out of every three the school-houses would be burned and the teachers rode upon a rail.

I believe I have replied to all the points you make. You ask me, if I should think proper to reply to your letter, to allow you to make use of the answer. I have nothing to disguise in regard to this rebellion, or the men who brought it about, and I have spoken out from the beginning, at home and abroad. My hope for the country is in the good sense, loyalty, and firmness of the loyal majorities in the two Houses. Let them settle the whole matter while they have the power, and put traitors and treason on the background in all time to come.

I have the honor to be, very truly, &c.,
W. G. BROWNLOW,
Governor of Tennessee.

The letter I addressed to Governor Brownlow happened to pass first into the hands of Hon. A. J. Fletcher, Secretary of State of Tennessee, and he voluntarily sent me the following response to my questions, which I have from him express authority to use as I please:

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE,
December 29, 1865.

SIR: Your letter to Governor Brownlow, of the 23d instant, came to my hands as Secretary of State acting for the Governor in his absence. I have forwarded it to his Excellency at Knoxville.

The questions submitted by you to Governor Brownlow are of such vital importance to every southern loyalist that I feel warranted in volunteering a statement of my own impression, seeing that you desire information from all sources.

I was elected to the office of Secretary of State in April last. I have been constantly at my post since. During the absence of the Governor I have performed his duties. He has been absent or ill a great portion of the time. At all times his heavy correspondence has passed through my hands. Official interviews with persons of all classes from all parts of the State concerning the reorganizing of the State and counties thereof have been of daily and almost hourly occurrence. I have tried to understand the mental status of the people of Tennessee, and have had every possible facility. Being a native of Tennessee, for twenty years a practicing lawyer, occasionally in politics, and extensively acquainted, if I do not comprehend the situation in Tennessee, it is for the want of capacity, and not for want of a proper standpoint.

If a desire for peace because of inability to make war, a willingness to submit because of inability to resist, accepting results because they cannot be rejected, recognizing the situation because, with the eyes open, it must be seen, and supporting the President because they are at his mercy, constitute loyalty, then, indeed, are our people thoroughly loyal. But if patriotism is an ingredient of loyalty: if love of country, respect for its flag, pride in its prosperity, and a desire to see its authority prevail, are necessary, then there are as many disloyal persons in Tennessee to-day as at any time since the beginning of 1861.

What, then, are to be the practical consequences of this condition of the public mind when the pressure of the conquest is removed and conciliating the Administration ceases to be a matter of policy? What will be our social condition, and what legislation will we have? These are your questions condensed.

There are about forty thousand Union voters in the State against one hundred thousand who sympathize with "a just but lost cause." These latter will form a compact party in the State, held together by hatred for those whom they have branded as Tories for deserting the South in her extremity, by a determination to keep the negro in a condition as near to slavery as possible, and probably by a desire to keep the South united with a view to ulterior designs.

The loyal people having seen the great object of saving the Union accomplished, will not contest seriously for the mastery in the State. They will remain loyal to the great Union party of the nation, but in a subdued and discouraged temper. Many will yield and go with the vast majority.

The attempt to disfranchise the majority has failed. Another attempt will be made and will fail, and this, too, with the military present and a loyal State government. Withdraw the pressure of the General Government, and a hundred thousand rebels, talented and wealthy, will laugh at any restraint imposed by less than half their number of citizens. They will find no difficulty in finding men not disfranchised who will serve their purposes in repealing all restraints upon them. The moral power of a vast majority over a small minority is illustrated in the present Legislature. The entire body was selected by a loyal State convention, and elected under a military proclamation, by general ticket, without opposition. Most of them had been exiles and sufferers during the war. All of them were of the most determined character of original Union men. They were tried and true, yet they have yielded to the approaches and blandishments of the wealthy rebels and the dread of offending constituents. One by one they go over or resign, until there is a bare majority left. There will always be a firm and resolute majority in East Tennessee; but they will be bound hand and foot by the other two divisions of the State. While it is impossible that loyalists should feel kindly toward a people who hung, shot, and imprisoned them or their friends, robbed them and burned their houses, and hunted them like wild beasts in the mountains as conscripts, the late rebels hate the Unionists with a most bitter and implacable hatred. They brand them with such epithets as "Tory," "Lincolnite," and "Abolitionist." They charge them with deserting the South in its struggle for liberty. This hatred is intensified by setting up a State government by the minority; by the attempt to disfranchise them; by appointing the judiciary and all the other officers of the State from the minority, and by the presence, like Mordecai, of the despised negro. In all the county and district elections if a loyalist dares to be a candidate, he is beaten. And, worst of all, in many localities this intense, mortal hatred finds its way into the jury box, and in spite of loyal judges and attorneys general, the miserable "Lincolnite" fails to obtain justice. If a negro is put upon his trial in many localities it amounts to a conviction, and the maximum penalty allowed by law. The pardoning power in the loyal Governor is his only protection. In the churches, too, this malignity is displayed. The rebel chaplain has his overflowing congregation, and to have been a guerrilla is no disparagement to the minister of Christ. Even Masonry has not been able to preserve its boasted harmony, but is thrown into discord.

There are five rebel daily papers at Memphis and four at Nashville, all well sustained. Repeated efforts have been made to start a Union paper at Memphis, but in vain. There are two at Nashville. One lives by having in part the public printing, and the other by triumphing. These rebel papers abuse and denounce in the most violent manner every officer in the State government who dares to oppose them. When an officer is appointed, sometimes they try to win him, but generally they open their batteries at once.

This picture is not exaggerated; and yet the shrewdest man might pass through the State over and over again and see but little of it unless he made it his study.

In view of what I have said it is not difficult to answer your questions.

The next Legislature will be two thirds rebel in each House. They will oppress the Union men in every way they dare. And East Tennessee will make an effort for a separate organization.

Two Union men and six rebels will be elected to the next Congress. The present loyal delegation owes its success to the presence of the military and the partial execution of the suffrage law—and to policy.

A black code will be adopted; the object will be to give the negro as little liberty as possible. They will go as far as they dare. Teachers from the North engaged in teaching negroes would not be admitted into society, and in many places be driven away.

A rebel judiciary will be elected and much that has been done by the present loyal State government will be declared void. Violence to Union men during the war will go unpunished, the government of the confederacy set up as a de facto government, and its laws of conscription, confiscation, impressment, &c., held valid for the time.

These are consequences almost certain to follow the abandonment of the loyal people by the General Government. Indeed, if the military was withdrawn now, the Legislature could not reassemble, nor would the Governor, or any loyal Governor, be safe for a single day.

I hope you will pardon the length of this paper, but I could not well say anything and say less. I know not how the Governor will answer your questions, but what I have said is the result of long and painful reflection upon the facts I have observed.

I am, sir, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. J. FLETCHER.

Hon. J. BAKER, M. C., Washington.

Sir, I place these documents before this House and before the country. Aside from the high and responsible sources from which they come, they bear upon their face every mark of being inherently true and well considered. These able and patriotic gentlemen, long resident of Tennessee, filling two of her highest offices, and largely acquainted with her people, ought to know something of her real condition to-day. And the condition they disclose is, in my opinion, totally incompatible with any valid claim to present resumption of representation in this Government. Governor Brownlow gives it as his opinion, "that if the military forces were all withdrawn from Tennessee the Legislature would be dispersed by a rebel mob;" and Mr. Fletcher says, "if the military was withdrawn now, the Legislature could not reassemble, nor would the Governor, or any loyal Governor, be safe for a single day; they would have to retire into East Tennessee." What reliable present bottom is there in such a state of things? "In two cases out of every three the school-houses would be burned and the teachers rode on a rail." We do not want to sit down again on that sort of liberty, sir! We have had quite enough of it in the past. "There are about forty thousand Union voters in the State against one hundred thousand whose sympathies are with 'a just but lost cause.' These latter will form a compact party in the State; held together by hatred for those whom they have branded as Tories for deserting the South in her extremity; by a determination to keep the negro in a condition as near to slavery as possible, and probably by a desire to keep the South united with a view to ulterior designs." "The next Legislature will be two thirds rebel in each House. They will oppress Union men in every way they dare." "A black code will be adopted; the object will be to give the negro as little liberty as possible." "The present loyal delegation owes its success to the presence of the military and to the partial execution of the suffrage law." "Two Union men and six rebels will be elected to the next Congress." "some such man as General Forrest will be elected Governor," and so forth and so forth, summing up in the whole a state of things which shows, in my judgment, the want of proper underpinning to safely rest present representation on. "And yet," says Mr. Fletcher, "the shrewdest man might pass through the State over and over again and see but little of it;" and still less, I suppose, if he went through by rail, making short calls, and wearing upon each shoulder a triplet of stars putting everybody on their good behavior!

Sir, let us act from no personal considerations and be governed by no surface views. Let us rise to the height of this great argument, both by intellectual conception and by practical execution. We do not want a reconstruction, "deformed, unfinished," "scarce half made up," and "sent before its time" to curse instead of blessing the country! After the close of our seven years' Revolution, it took eight years to span the chasm to the new order and adopt the present Constitution. Why shall we not now have a little hiatus of eighteen or twenty-four months between the suppression of this tremendous rebellion and that definite Civil Order upon which the Republic is to be launched for the long future? That great amendment abolishing slavery has traversed in ten months' time three fourths of the Legislatures and constituted bodies of the States. In like time, it may be, the additional constitutional guarantees we need can receive a like sanction.

Then, sir, we shall have built our house upon a rock, and not upon moving quicksand. Then the blood that has flowed and the hearts that have broken and died in this terrible war for liberty and nationality shall come forth from the ground and the grave and bless the hand of the builder! Oh, I warn you, sir, I warn you, that when conservatives make haste liberty is in danger! It is for a purpose, and to the cost of humanity, that they seek to violate the fixed maxims of their conduct and the ingrained principles of their life. When fighting against the birth of new liberties—as they so strangely love to fight; when holding back the hand that would lift a burden from the quivering heart of the downtrodden poor—as they so cruelly love to hold—they are fond of telling us after Linnaeus, "There are no leaps in nature;" and after Bacon, "Time is the great innovator, but he innovates slowly." But now, when a very little time is needed to concrete the fruits of this great struggle—to ripen the blood of the martyred dead into a sure and everlasting heritage of liberty to all the people—the eagle hasteneth not more swiftly to his prey, than do these same conservatives to dash this fairest prospect that Heaven has ever vouchsafed to man on earth! Ah, God! if we do but let them do it! Men of the North! men of the North! stand firm till this sacred finishing duty shall be performed! Shoulder to shoulder, and shield to shield, let the whole grand column of Liberty and Union march on, until the results of this great war, so dearly earned by the mighty agony of the Nation's bleeding heart, shall be gathered up and made secure forever! And he that falters now—though his plume may have shown in the forefront of the fight, and his voice rallied the clans of liberty in other days—for him let the portion be, "Ichabod! Ichabod! thy glory is departed!"

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman, the great political problem of the day, the problem on the right solution of which will depend the well-being of our country for ages is, what shall we do with the people lately in rebellion? The embarrassments which attend this question are not all embraced within its language, since one of the most serious of them is, who shall decide it; whether Congress, the courts, or the Executive, or some or all of them?

If there are no rights to be conferred, if the whole matter depends upon the existing rights of these people, then certainly Congress has nothing to do with it. The mere deciding upon the legality of the elections of claimants to seats, so far from being the solving of the great problem, is indeed no part of it. If, on the other hand, the business is not the mere ascertainment of rights, but the creating and conferring of them; and especially if there are no existing rights that interfere with such solution of the question as will be for the best interests of the rebels as well as ourselves, then the question is to be answered and the remedy applied, not by the Executive, not by the courts, but by the law-making power of the Government. I propose, therefore, to consider what is the legal status of these people, and whether they have any rights which will prevent our treating the question as one solely of policy.

If the late disturbance of the public peace was mere insurrection, now suppressed, it is clear that the rights of the people of the South as a people are in no way affected by the result, and the whole business consists in ascertaining those rights and remitting the respective southern communities to them. But to call that insurrection that resisted the military forces of the country for four years with success; that destroyed the lives of half a million of its citizens and brought mourning to one sixth of all the homes in the land; that cost on both sides twice the national debt of England, the product of a century of gigantic wars; that seized and held by force half the domain of the country; that swept our commerce from the ocean and had its flag respected, not only in foreign ports, but in the courts of our own country; and that was only suppressed by a series of military achievements such as the world never saw; to call that insurrection is a strange abuse of language. No! the conflict was war, terrible, bloody war, in which the defeated resisted to the last with a valor that commanded the wonder of the world, and then surrendered without conditions. The inquiry now is, what are the legal consequences of such a struggle with such a termination?

If the States were sovereign, they had the right to make war and accept its consequences; and a sovereign State vanquished in war ceases to exist, or exists only at the will of the conqueror. The advocates of the old theory of State sovereignty, therefore, can set up no claim for the vanquished to interfere with our considering the question as one of policy, unembarrassed by the rights of defeated rebels.

But assume the opposite hypothesis, that the States are component parts of a single sovereignty, resembling counties, cities, and other such municipalities, how does this alter the result? Because they had less rights than sovereignty before the war shall we concede them greater rights than those of vanquished sovereignty now? Because they inaugurated war wrongfully and traitorously, not being sovereign, is this crime to be accounted in their favor in the construction of their surviving rights?

In this point of view, the conflict was civil war, differing from international war only in the fact that in the former one of the belligerents claims, has exercised, and is trying to enforce sovereign rights over the other. A logical consequence of this condition of things is that if the claimant of sovereign rights be the victor, it may elect to treat the vanquished either as traitors or prisoners of war. It may enforce upon them either the civil law or the rights of conquest. The vanquished, having failed to throw off their allegiance, cannot deny being citizens to avoid the punishment of treason. On the other hand, having forsworn their allegiance, having set up an independent government and waged war as a nation, they are estopped from pleading the rights of citizenship to defeat the rights of conquest. All this is in accordance with common reason. It is fully sustained by writers on the law of nations, and is laid down as applicable to the late rebellion by the Supreme Court in the prize cases.

In one of these points of view, therefore, the rebel States are destroyed, and in the other it is for the Government to elect whether they are or not. In either case there are no rights of the vanquished to embarrass our action, to prevent our reviving the old State governments, creating new ones, or keeping the conquered country in a state similar to that of Territories, according as one or another of these measures may best subserve the interests of the whole country.

But it is said that States cannot rebel, that the late war was waged by individuals only, and therefore that the States have been in no way affected by its progress or termination. This is strange argument from the lips of those who believe in the sovereignty of the States, since one essential element of sovereignty is the power to make war. But without this attribute why cannot States rebel? Why may they not inaugurate civil war? To make war, combinations of men are necessary, quasi corporations for belligerent purposes. One man cannot make war; thousands cannot, acting with out concert. The organized body that wages war may be one formed for the purpose, or it may be a preëxisting one formed for some other purpose and wrongfully or rightfully perverted. If the organized body that wages war is the State, if the State employs soldiers and pays them, appoints and commissions officers, provides arms and munitions of war, establishes courts-martial, and if with all this war really exists, can it be said that the State does not make war? If the war is civil war, beginning on that side by rebellion, can it be said that the State does not rebel?

I can well understand that a rebellion may exist without being participated in by a State. If the combination of men that wages war is not the combination that forms the State, as in the cases of the Dorr rebellion and the whisky insurrection, then the State is not in rebellion. But if the Governor of Pennsylvania, the Legislature, the courts, the entire municipal machinery, had been turned over to the purposes of the whisky insurrection, history would have truly said that the State of Pennsylvania rebelled.

Now, what State of the entire eleven not now represented in the Government of the country did not turn its entire organization over to the purposes of the late rebellion? What Governors, what legislators, the judges of what courts, did not unite in the blasphemous oath to subvert the Government of their country? What functions of government, executive, legislative, or judicial, in any of those States were not used for the single purpose of waging war against the United States?

Some hypocritical Democrat may say that the States as States did not wage war, but that the war was waged by that combination known, while it existed, as the confederate States. The answer is, that the eleven States constituted that combination, operated through that combination, did everything that combination did, and that, when the combination waged war, each State, each constituent part of it, waged war.

An organized body of men carried on war against the Government of the United States for four years. That organized body was composed of eleven smaller organized bodies. These occupied districts of country bounded by State lines. They had eleven Governors, eleven Legislatures, eleven supreme or superior courts, and each of them had its State, county, and township officers, performing respectively all the functions of such officers in an organized State; and every one of these officers, from the Governor down to the overseer of highways, was active in the combination that waged war. During all this time what were the States doing? Common sense would say, waging war.

These eleven States combined, therefore, on the one hand, and the Government of the country on the other, have been for four years engaged in war; civil war, certainly, but not the less war on that account. Now, war can terminate only by treaty, by cessation of hostilities, or by one of the combatants conquering the other. How did the recent war terminate? Not, certainly, by treaty. The northern allies of the southern enemy failed to bring that about. Doubtless the rebels and their political friends would like the theory of a drawn battle. That is the only hypothesis upon which their claim to equal participation in the Government of the country with the successful belligerent can be based. But the facts will not warrant this hypothesis. It is hardly consistent with the acceptance of pardons from the Executive, and the incessant begging at the doors of Congress for admission to seats so scornfully abandoned five years ago. The only remaining alternative is that of conquest, and history will find little difficulty in determining on which side that occurred, though it seems here sometimes to be an open question.

In short, from 1860 to 1865 a combination of individuals existed formed for the purpose of taking by force a portion of the territory of the United States, and forming therein an independent sovereignty. This combination was composed of citizens of the United States. It embraced almost all the citizens of eleven States. It possessed and used for its own purposes the municipal power of those States. It levied war against the Government on land and sea. It claimed to be a nation. It was treated as such by foreign Powers, who accorded to it the rights of a belligerent, who treated its vessels of war as privateers and not as pirates, who recognized its flag, and who protected, if not received, its ministers. It was treated as a nation for war purposes by our own Government in giving to its people when captured the rights of prisoners of war, and in recognizing its commissions to rob and murder on the high seas as legalizing robbery and murder.

For some time it was doubtful whether this combination would maintain itself as a nation or not. The party now asking us to ignore the past, the horrible and bloody past, and take in friendship the hands of the murderers over the graves of the murdered, this party said it would so maintain itself. The last Democratic national convention proclaimed the victory already on its side. In fact for four years it did succeed in holding the position of a nation, because for that length of time it maintained war. Finally the military forces of this combination were vanquished by those of the United States, and surrendered without terms to the victors. By this means the combination was broken up and those who composed it became a conquered people.

Now, according to the strict law of nations, as always enforced in ancient times, and always now unless restrained by respect to public opinion, a conquered people have no rights, either civil or political. With all the restraints which modern civilization has imposed upon the will of the conqueror, he may still exact all the guarantees necessary to prevent a recurrence of hostilities, and he is the sole and irresponsible judge of those guarantees. His power is therefore absolute, and if he abuses it the law of nations knows no remedy.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BROOMALL. I will yield for a question.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if he wishes us to understand him as asserting that those people may be reduced to absolute despotism if the conquering power sees fit to exercise that power over them?

Mr. BROOMALL. I have said that if the power of the conqueror in war is abused the law of nations knows no remedy. I hope the gentleman's question is answered. I am not for using this absolute power for the purpose of abusing it, or of abusing any of the people of the United States, North or South; but I am maintaining the right of the conqueror always in international wars to treat the conquered as it pleases, without responsibility to anybody but the Almighty; and in civil wars, in rebellions, it may treat the conquered and revolted subjects or citizens either as traitors or as prisoners of war; and if it elects to treat them as prisoners of war, then it does away with the distinction between international and civil war.

Mr. NIBLACK. I want to understand the gentleman's position. Does he claim this as a moral right, or as a right of force merely? If the power is abused in this respect, he says there is no remedy. Do I understand him as holding that it would not be a case in which other nations might interfere?

Mr. BROOMALL. Not according to the laws of nations. Other nations may remonstrate, but they can do nothing more.

Mr. NIBLACK. Are not the whole family of nations interested in seeing that the laws of nations are kept inviolate, and when they are grossly outraged may not other nations rightfully interfere?

Mr. BROOMALL. Let me ask the gentleman in turn, why it was that the United States and the other nations of the world did not interfere when England chose, in the exercise of this unlimited and irresponsible power, to shoot her prisoners of war in the Indies from the mouths of cannon? They did not interfere because it was not their business. They had no right to interfere. In fact, if the gentleman will reflect for one moment he will see that there is nothing in his question. A nation is responsible to no other earthly jurisdiction for the exercise of its power. It is the sole and single judge of its power. The very fact of sovereignty renders it irresponsible to any civil authority—makes it the single and sole judge of its actions.

The position taken by the late rebels who are now claiming as a right the restoration of all they have forfeited, the position so forcibly laid down by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] as well as by his fellow-laborers, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] is in substance this: though the people of those eleven States became first traitors, then belligerents, and finally suppressed rebels, yet this had no effect upon the States themselves. The States being either sovereign, or component parts of a larger sovereignty, could not be destroyed or in any manner affected by the acts of the people.

According to this theory, there was no time during the last five years when these States had not a right to representation in Congress. In the darkest days of that eventful period the Representatives of South Carolina had a right to seats in this Hall, a right to vote on all questions of supplies to the Army, on all loan bills, on measures touching the punishment of guerrillas and the confiscation of rebel property.

That the Democrats of this body should maintain such a doctrine is not to be wondered at, since, during all that period, the most malignant traitor in the entire South would have voted with them upon all these questions. But it is matter of some surprise that these few but adroit men have managed to convert the gentleman from New York to their political persuasion.

Imagine the Representatives and Senators from these eleven States voting down, by the aid of their northern friends, the bill providing for drafting men to fill the depleted ranks of the Army after the retreat from Richmond; voting down the bill authorizing the issuing of legal tenders, when money could not be borrowed at twelve per cent. per annum; voting down the bill providing for the enlistment of negroes when the drain upon the white men of the country had begun to be oppressive.

The business of the day might have been rendered still interesting and impressive by some southern member asking an appropriation to fortify the southern harbors, or to pay rebel slave-owners for their confiscated chattels, presenting a bill providing pensions for wounded rebels and the widows of dead ones, or a bill providing for the pay of the keeper of the prison at Andersonville, all of which would probably have received the full party vote, and some of which might have carried.

This is imposing no difficult task on the imagination. If these eleven communities are now full and complete States of the Union, then they always have been. If they are entitled to representation now, then they always have been entitled to representation, and it is not supposing too much to suppose that their Representatives would have voted with their fellow-Democrats of the North, whose position upon these and kindred questions is part of the country's history.

It is argued in some quarters that these eleven States existed in full life and power during the rebellion, but that their functions were suspended for want of proper persons to perform them. Let us examine this position. Now the State of South Carolina, that had its functions suspended, was not the State of South Carolina that constituted one of the confederacy. That State of South Carolina had its functions performed. It had a Governor, legislative bodies, courts, all the machinery of a State, in full and active vigor until after Sherman's famous march. Were there, then, two States of South Carolina, one loyal but dormant, the other active but in rebellion? By the State, in this argument, nobody means the mere land and water embraced within the limits, nor the mere unorganized inhabitants, but the body-politic; and the advocates of this theory must not expect to make many proselytes until they can explain what a State is that has no organized citizens and neither executive, legislative, nor judicial bodies. Where a case of suspended animation continues so thoroughly suspended for four years, one must be permitted to doubt the possibility of resuscitation.

Mr. NIBLACK. I dislike to be troublesome, but the gentleman's remarks attracted my attention, and I wish to understand whether his position is that the States lately in rebellion are not now States within the meaning of the Constitution in the full sense of the word. Is that his argument?

Mr. BROOMALL. I do not distinctly hear the gentleman.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to inquire whether I rightly understand him when I understand him to argue that the States lately in rebellion are not now States within the Union within the meaning of the Constitution?

Mr. BROOMALL. With right to representation here?

Mr. NIBLACK. In the general sense—the full sense.

Mr. BROOMALL. With full State powers?

Mr. NIBLACK. Are they not now "States" within the meaning of the Constitution when it speaks of States?

Mr. BROOMALL. I now understand the gentleman's question and I will answer it. These organized communities—for if the newspapers represent correctly, they are somewhat organized—are not, in my opinion, full States of the Union. If I had thought they were, I should not have voted for the concurrent resolution by which the committee on reconstruction was appointed.

Mr. NIBLACK. Then I beg to inquire what, in the gentleman's opinion, are now the relations of the President of the United States, he being a citizen of the State of Tennessee, to the rest of the United States and the people of the United States?

Mr. BROOMALL. I heard that question started early in this session, and it struck me that it would not be repeated. I have yet to learn that it is necessary, under the Constitution, for a man to be a citizen of any State of the Union before he can become eligible to the offices of President and Vice President. I find nothing in the Constitution which requires it, and I would like to have seen an objection sustained to the reelection of President Lincoln upon the ground that he was a citizen of the District of Columbia, and therefore not a citizen of any State, if he had so been, and if he had chosen he would have so been.

I hope these interruptions will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. NIBLACK. We will extend the time.

Mr. BROOMALL. Undoubtedly the present President of the United States was at the time of the breaking out of the rebellion a citizen of the State of Tennessee and a citizen of the United States. If he had headed an army of the rebellion, if he had joined in the treason, probably the gentleman might have voted for him for Vice President; I certainly should not have done so. In that event he would undoubtedly have become ineligible for that office, because he would have lost his position of citizen of the United States by his own belligerency, and by his State being in a state of war against the United States. But he was not in the rebellion. He was here at the time the rebellion broke out, performing his duties as a Senator of the United States. And when he went to Tennessee he went there in the interests of the Government. He was in no way concerned in the rebellion there. He remained a citizen of the United States just as much as if Tennessee had never rebelled, and was therefore properly eligible to the office of either President or Vice President?

Mr. NIBLACK. One other remark, and I will not interrupt the gentleman further. As to how I might have voted, in the case supposed by the gentleman, that is not the question now. But I beg to inquire of the gentleman what the Constitution means when it says the candidates for President and Vice President must be citizens of different States?

Mr. BROOMALL. The Constitution does not say so.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is not that the purport of it?

Mr. BROOMALL. No, sir. It says they shall not both be citizens of the same State. And I am inclined to think that at the time of the last presidential election Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson were not both citizens of the same State.

Mr. STEVENS. I will ask my colleague [Mr. BROOMALL] this question: suppose the present President had been a citizen of the Territory of Nebraska, would he have been eligible to the office for which he was nominated?

Mr. BROOMALL. That reminds me of a question I asked, in sport, of my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] when he returned from the Baltimore convention. I asked how it was that they had nominated a foreigner for Vice President; and when he expressed some little dissatisfaction at what had been done, I remember I told him I thought a man was eligible for the office of President or Vice President even though he was a citizen of the Territory of Tennessee, if he was a native-born citizen of the United States.

Mr. NIBLACK. Suppose that Mr. Johnson is not a citizen of any State, is he eligible for President or Vice President?

Mr. BROOMALL. I so understand the Constitution. If he is a citizen of the United States, born within the limits of the United States, he is eligible, no matter whether he was born in a Territory that has never become a State or born in the District of Columbia, or inside some of the forts of the country.

Mr. STEVENS. That answers my question.

Mr. NIBLACK. If he was a citizen of Tennessee, would he not be taken out by Tennessee rebelling?

Mr. BROOMALL. I will answer that question by putting another. If all the members of this House except the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] should choose to get into a riot, would that carry the gentleman from Indiana into the riot unless he chose to go into it? Andrew Johnson did not choose to be carried into this mischief.

I do not wish to be understood as advocating any extended exercise of unlimited power over the conquered South. The position I take is, that the Government has the right to pursue any policy it may deem best, unembarrassed by rights of defeated rebels; in other words, that those conquered people have no rights except such as are derived from the action or permission of the General Government since the surrender. Let us see whether any party in the country is seriously questioning this position.

The Democrats, who denied the right to coerce States, who voted against supplies of men and money to the Army, against loan bills, who maintained the divine right to hold slaves, who magnified rebel victories and refused credit to our own, and whose constant cry, "You cannot conquer the South!" resounded throughout the land and blended its last echoes with the news of Lee's surrender; the Democrats, I say, have accepted the new condition of things with most commendable amiability, and have so far amended their political creed as to indorse the policy of the President.

These semi-Democrats, looking over each shoulder with the timidity and almost the grace of a startled fawn, lest they should be taking too bold a step, still indorse the policy of the President. Indeed, they claim to be the especial champions of that policy; and so jealous are they in this regard that they almost deny the right of anybody else to occupy the same position. Finally, the Republicans, of course, indorse the policy of the President. Selecting him as they did from the hottest of the contest, tried and found true when all around him were false, they could not mistake his sentiments then, nor could either in so short a time change so as to become antagonistic to the other.

Indorsed as it is by all the political parties of the country, what is the policy of the President? Let us deduce it from his acts, the only legitimate mode. He has taken military possession of the South as a conqueror. He has treated all the old State governments as having fallen with Lee's surrender, or crushed them since, and has founded new ones upon their ruins. In doing this, he has begun with the original elements, the unorganized people, totally ignoring the fact that they had ever been bodies politic, utterly overthrowing even that part of the old governments that provided for the creation of new ones. Can anything be more radical than this? What wonder that my colleague, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. STEVENS,] should claim to be a disciple of the President?

More than this, in forming these new States directly from the people, he has prescribed who shall vote, and how and when they shall vote. Having thus obtained State conventions representing the will of the people, he has prescribed for them the constitutions they shall frame. The ordinances of secession of the old extinct State governments must be declared void, not repealed. The rebel debt must be repudiated. The constitutional amendment must be ratified. When all this is done he has reviewed the work of these conventions and told them when to adjourn.

Now, if there is any party in the country demanding measures more radical than these—than the creating of new States by proclamation after destroying the old ones by war—it would be refreshing to see its creed. If it were not for an abiding faith in the sleepless vigilance of the Democracy, who have stood guard for four years over the Constitution, sounding the alarm upon the smallest pretext of an occasion, seeing the Trojan horse in every mule that pointed its ears toward that sacred instrument; if it were not for this faith, one might be permitted to question whether there is in the organic law of the land any provision empowering the Commander-in-Chief of the armies to create civil governments in conquered territory without act of Congress.

But all parties approve of this. The Democrats, the great champions of the constitutional rights of rebels, pronounce constitutions so formed pure emanations from the will of the people and lineal descendants of the old States. The Republicans say that this first step toward reconstruction is all the most earnest can ask for, if only followed up with the necessary caution and by the necessary legislation; and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] from his middle stand-point, responds "amen" to both propositions.

It being conceded, then, that the rebels have no rights to conflict with what has been done, and that being all and even more than all that any party proposes, I care nothing about the peculiar theory upon which each party bases our right to do this. My colleague [Mr. STREVENSON] may say that the rebel States are out of the Union, and may call the people of the South conquered alien enemies. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] may reply that if this were so, by conquering them we have succeeded to their rights and liabilities, and have already assumed the rebel debt—that if a wrong doer takes forcible possession of half my dwelling house and for four years resists all my efforts to dislodge him, when I succeed I become his legal representative, and whether I succeed to assets or not, I not only become responsible for his baker's bill, his grocer's, and his butcher's, but I must pay the very lawyer he employed to defraud me of my rights.

My colleague may call the old organizations dead States if he is only willing to put living ones in their places. And the gentleman from New York may urge that the rebels are merely suspended, if he is only willing to let them hang and make our future arrangements with the loyal men of the South.

The problem, therefore, being the conferring of new rights, and not the ascertaining of old ones, nothing but the supreme legislative power of the Government is competent to the task. The President as Commander-in-Chief may take military possession of the conquered country. He may erect for temporary purposes a species of semi-civil, semi-military government, and he may appoint or let the people elect provisional governors, but he cannot make a State of the Union. Such a power would be monstrous. The framers of the Constitution never intended to give a President, reëligible and a possible candidate for reëlection, the right by proclamation to create additional electoral votes.

I am satisfied that the President assumes no such power. It is only fair to infer that what has seemed an exercise of despotic power, what has seemed executive legislation, is only a temporary expedient forced upon the President by the necessity of the occasion. It is fair to assume that he has only invited these southern communities to frame State governments and submit them to Congress for approval, just as California did. Whether he has made his overtures to the wrong parties is a question that must await the result of his experiment, if indeed that experiment has not already been fully tried.

Upon the political rights of the defeated rebels I have shown that all parties are agreed, since all parties are consenting to the utter ignoring of all their possible rights. But by whom the necessary new political rights are to be conferred upon them seems to be an open question. The Republicans maintain that the functions of the war power extend no further than taking military possession of the conquered country—that creating States therein, either de novo or out of old ones, is legislation, and that no department of Government but Congress can pass acts of Congress. They therefore hold that as yet nothing has been done in the business of reconstruction except taking and holding the country subjugated in military possession.

From all this, two very small, but very select parties, the Democrats and the Conservatives, entirely dissent. The former, represented by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] hold that these southern communities are entitled now, without further action, to representation here. The latter, represented by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] maintain that with certain guarantees, to be fixed upon by the President alone, they will be so entitled. I will leave these gentlemen and their respective parties to settle this slight discrepancy between them in their own way, satisfied that the country has little interest in it. But I will venture to suggest that the organizations existing in the South are not those which existed there six years ago, nor those that formed the rebel confederacy, nor those that surrendered to our arms, nor the legitimate successors of them or any of them, but new creations antagonistic to them, set up over their ruins by the Commander-in-Chief of the armies. I will venture further to suggest that the policy they unite in sustaining would have been called, in the better days of the Republic, the arbitrary exercise of despotic power, and pronounced worthy of the first Napoleon.

While these parties are settling between themselves which of their theories accords best with submission to the unlimited power of a single man, I will direct the attention of the majority of this House and of the country to the question, what shall we do with these conquered people? Now, I do not object to the organizations we find among them performing the functions, to some extent, of State governments, that they emanated from the Executive, nor that their origin was military, nor that they were forced upon the people by the power of the conqueror, though all this is true. If they are republican in form, if they are satisfactory to the people, and, above all, if we can safely intrust to them the rights of the loyal men of the South, of whatever caste or lineage, we ought to legalize now what we might have authorized.

But before this is done, let us be very sure that these organizations contain the requisites, and above all the last one. We would deserve the execration of the civilized world if we should now basely desert our allies in the South, and sacrifice them as a peace offering to our old enemies. I am not demanding sanguinary punishments; I am willing even to dispense with my colleague's wholesale confiscations; but the system of reconstruction that does not effectually guaranty the rights of the Union men of the South cannot command my support.

It has been said in certain quarters that we have already acknowledged these pretended State governments by permitting them to take part in ratifying the late constitutional amendment, and taking advantage of their act to complete the ratification. But who has done this? Not Congress, nor the courts, nor any department of Government that had rights or duties in the premises. It would be curious if we must consult those who have repudiated the Constitution whether we shall amend it or not. What have they to do with altering a compact who deny being parties to it? According to this notion, if these eleven States had held out forever, the remaining twenty-five, not being three fourths of the thirty-six, never could alter the Constitution. Besides, if the votes of those States were needed to ratify the amendment, then there was no amendment to ratify. If these States must be counted in the ratification they were entitled to a voice in the adoption, and if so, the amendment did not pass by the constitutional majority in either branch of Congress. If two thirds of the Senators and Representatives from the loyal States alone could lawfully adopt the amendment, three fourths of the Legislatures of the loyal States alone could lawfully ratify it.

Slavery is indeed abolished among the conquered rebels, but not by virtue of acts of ratification passed by their pretended Legislatures under duress, and by dictation from Washington. No, slavery there fell when the last rebel belligerent surrendered. This position is of no practical importance now since in any view of the case the institution is abolished. But it may serve to explain my view of the status of the conquered rebels to consider the effect of conquest on the relation of master and slave.

Slavery in America was not founded upon positive enactment. Laws regulated that relation, but did not create it. No master could appeal to the statute by virtue of which he owned his slave. In tracing his title the owner could only show that he lawfully succeeded to the rights of the former owner of the mother of his chattel, and so backward step by step until the first owner was found in Africa as the captor, in war of some kind, of the first slave ancestress. In short, slaves are prisoners of war and their descendants, the children following the condition of the mother.

Formerly, according to the customs of the most civilized nations, prisoners of war were at the mercy of the captor, who might kill them, enslave them, or sell them; and even now there is nothing to prevent this except the changed customs of nations.

Barbarians were no better than Christians in this regard, and the princes of Dahomey made war and captured and enslaved prisoners. Now, suppose while yet the slave trade was a divine institution, a prince of that country, with his hundred slaves, had been captured by a neighboring belligerent, sold to some enlightened Englishman, and transported to the markets of the New World. What would become of the relation of master and slave between the prince and his subjects? Would it have been respected in a Washington slave market? Could it have been set up with effect in any court in Christendom? Certainly not; and why? Because conquest reduces the subjects of it to one uniform level. No one can claim rights over another, because none can claim rights except under the law of nations, and the law of nations knows no distinction between the lord and the serf when both are prisoners of war.

When the people of the South submitted their cause of quarrel to the arbitrament of arms, they staked the existence of the institution of slavery upon the result. They must succeed or it must perish. If they had forced terms from the Government their system might have been saved; but a surrender without conditions is a surrender of their entire organized population as prisoners of war, and prisoners of war can hold no prisoners.

All this is in accordance with common reason. The title of these people to their slaves was no better than that of the first captor to the first slave ancestress. In fact it was the same title. Now, if that captor and that ancestress had been themselves captured, does any one pretend that the relation of master and slave would have continued between them?

It follows that no amendment to the Constitution, no proclamation of emancipation was needed to abolish slavery among those who waged war against the Government and were conquered. The result placed master and slave on the same level, from which neither can rise without the consent of the conqueror.

I return to the question, shall Congress legalize these pretended State governments? and to the question on which its decision, in my judgment, mainly depends, can we safely intrust to these governments the rights and interests of the Union men of the South? The proposition itself is rather a startling one. These governments are almost wholly in the hands of men who were actively engaged in the rebellion, traitors, pardoned traitors certainly, but not the less traitors. Executive clemency may remit the punishment, but it cannot uncommit the crime. Was Arnold invited to take part in the Government of the country? Was Burr, after his treason? Yet these experiments would have been trifling compared with what we are asked to try.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. BROOMALL. I will not object if my time is extended.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would not interrupt the gentleman, only the inquiry I desire to make seems to be pertinent to this branch of the gentleman's argument. I would like to get his opinion, as he seems to have studied the subject somewhat, as to whether the President has the power to grant a special pardon for an alleged crime before the person charged with its commission has been convicted?

Mr. BROOMALL. I can only answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] by stating that the law has been so held in the State of Pennsylvania. I am inclined to think that the President can pardon for a crime before conviction. But I express that opinion without an examination of the Constitution and laws of the United States on that particular subject.

Mr. STEVENS. While we are upon that subject I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. BROOMALL] if he thinks that the President can restore property that has been confiscated as belonging to a belligerent, and the proceeds of which have been vested in the United States? Can the President thus restore property confiscated?

Mr. BROOMALL. If I am to answer that question from my own stand-point, I would say that the President has not the power. If I am to answer it from the stand-point of those who have adopted the President's policy to its fullest extent, I should say that I do not know any limit that they make to the power of the Executive.

These men are expected to represent their States in Congress. They are large holders of the rebel debt. Are they therefore especially qualified to vote for taxation to pay the cost of their own subjugation? Some of them have lost a limb in the rebel service; others have lost sons and brothers. Are they therefore especially qualified to vote pensions to our wounded soldiers and the widows of our dead ones? In other countries such men have been hanged, or at the very least have been suffered to expatriate themselves to avoid that punishment. We propose not only to let them aid in governing us, but to turn over to their sole and irresponsible care the lives and property of all the loyal men of the South. An experiment so new in the world's history, and against which the presumptions of common reason are so strong, had better be first tried on a very small scale and watched narrowly.

It was much for a man to stand true to his allegiance in the very heart of the rebellion, withstanding the example and the entreaties of friends, and the threats of enemies. It was no merit to be loyal in Massachusetts. With all the surroundings that incited to loyalty there, a man must be intensely bad to be otherwise. But in South Carolina the case was widely different. There the loyal man was looked upon as a spy and a traitor. For four long years his life was at the mercy of the mob, his dwelling invited the torch of the incendiary. Arrests, imprisonments, tortures, were always anticipations, often realities to him. Yet a body of men interspersed throughout the South, not large, not influential, not even all white men, withstood all this, and for four long years ministered to the comfort and safety of the Union soldier, and prayed in secret for a return of the Federal power and a sight of the old flag. Shall we turn these men over to the tender mercies of their rebel neighbors, whom their very virtues have rendered the worse enemies? Shall we cause these men in very bitterness of heart to curse their loyalty? There may be future rebellions. The new mode of punishing treason does not seem calculated to prevent its repetition. Let our country beware how it tramples upon virtue and makes crime profitable; how it offers a reward for future treason.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio, obtained the floor.

Mr. BROOMALL. I trust that the House will allow me to finish my remarks, inasmuch as I have been so much interrupted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. With the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HUBBELL,] I will move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] be allowed sufficient time to conclude his remarks.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL. Has any information been received by Congress or the country from the district lately in rebellion calculated to rebut the presumption that those whom the Government has conquered are still the enemies of the Government? General Grant has visited that country, and after a week of investigation has given us as his opinion that the late rebels are seriously returning to their allegiance, that all disaffection is fast disappearing, and that the people are about ready to be intrusted with their own government.

Now, with all due respect to that distinguished commander, I must be allowed to suggest that he was hardly the man to send upon such an errand. The Lieutenant General is probably the only man in America who, if known in any community in it, could by no possibility ascertain the sentiments of that community. Surrounded, as he doubtless was, by admirers, by flatterers, by politicians, his chance of obtaining access to the common people and learning their sentiments was about as good as if he had made the tour he did inclosed in one of Herring's patent safes. Every man he met was interested in thinking as he thought, in pleasing him in return for the honor of his company. Would any one differ in opinion from General Grant? Would he hear disloyalty, disaffection? What other conclusion could he come to than that, though there might be smothered treason somewhere, it was confined to the common people, the lower orders with whom he did not mingle?

Carl Schurz has also made a tour of investigation among the defeated rebels. He labored under no such difficulties as those which surrounded General Grant. He was not inclosed miles deep with polite, obsequious, and hypocritical disloyalty. His report is before the country, and it by no means favors the experiment we are trying. He thinks Congress had better send one or more investigating committees into that country before intrusting its destiny to conquered rebels.

If there were no other difficulties in the way, can we intrust the negroes unaided to the rule of their late masters? If no new cause of disagreement had occurred between the two classes, what warrant have we for supposing that the dominant race would treat the servile one better than heretofore? And heretofore the former enslaved the latter, and made it a crime to speak of liberty within its hearing. It will be answered that slavery being abolished, a recurrence of that state of things is impossible. This is true in words; but if we leave all power in the hands of the dominant race, we will have done the negro little kindness in abolishing slavery. We will have abolished the duties of the slaveholder while we will have preserved his power and his spirit, only transferring them from the individual to the mass. We will have left the negro a slave to the community, with no one man pecuniarily interested in his well-being.

But a new cause of disagreement has arisen. In the gigantic struggle through which we have passed, the negro has been on the side of the country and against his master. He sought our camps and offered his services at a time when we were base enough to send him back to his master to be scourged. And even under that treatment no Union spy or prisoner, no rebel refugee or deserter, ever threw himself upon the protection of a negro and was betrayed.

Loyal to a Government to which he owed nothing but chains; a Government which had authoritatively pronounced from its highest altar of justice that he had no rights which it was bound to respect; true when the hand that fed him and could crush him became false; shedding his blood and leaving his bones on the most sanguinary battle-fields, fighting, and falling when he fell, always on the side of loyalty, shall we leave him to the tender mercies of his and our old enemies? I answer, without his consent, never!

What then? Shall we confer upon the negro the right of suffrage in the reclaimed territory? Certainly, if that will protect him. While I entirely dissent from the opinion of my colleague

[Mr. KELLEY] that Congress, under the Constitution as it now stands, can regulate the right of suffrage in the States of the Union, yet I cannot doubt its power to do so in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and in the country reclaimed from the rebellion.

At one time the Democrats would have denied this power; but standing committed to the acts of the President in the conquered territory as they do, claiming for him the right to organize States therein and fix the right of suffrage by proclamation, it is hardly worth while to inquire what possible power they could consistently deny to the President and Congress united.

In short, the Government of the United States above all other duties owes it to itself and to humanity to guard the rights of those who, in the midst of rebellion, periled their lives and fortunes for its honor, of whatever caste or lineage they be. These people have common cause. In the darkest day of our country's trial, when treason within and treason without waited only to shake hands over the grave of the Republic, the loyal men of the North demanded the aid of the negro as a soldier. He came amid the sneers of polished disloyalty and the curses of unpunished. He shared the danger and the victory. Now the loyal men of our own lineage in the South are asking the aid of the negro to confront pardoned but unrepentant traitors at the ballot-box. Again the sneers and curses of polished and unpunished disloyalty are brought into requisition. But shall the request be denied? It is within the possible future that the loyal white men and the loyal black men, working side by side, will yet reconstruct the South on the basis of equal rights to all men, not only before the law, but in that which makes the law, thrusting out of the way those abortions assuming to be States, the hybrid products of the most corrupt elements of northern and southern society.

Finally, it remains for me to answer the question with which I set out, for myself and in my own way. I am willing to try these new organizations long enough to show either that they are or are not capable of protecting the interests of all classes, holding them subject to the controlling legislation of Congress, to be used to prevent or correct abuses. If the experiment should run through an entire decade, if these people should be forty years in the wilderness, no evil can result to the South or the country. Almost all of local government may be carried on in these organizations as in the States. Congress, it is true, will lose the services of such men as represented that country in 1861, but Congress can afford to do this.

During this experiment these people will be taxed by the United States without their consent; but this is a small punishment for so enormous a crime as that which brought upon them this state of things. They taxed us without our consent, both in blood and money, for four long years.

In the mean time let the Constitution be so amended that a representative from South Carolina will not be elected by a fourth of the number of electors required for one from Pennsylvania; so that if the negro of the South must be counted as a political element in the Union he shall cast his own vote, and not have it cast by his antagonistic and probably disloyal neighbor.

If the experiment shall result in favor of these organizations, I propose that they be constituted States of the Union by act of Congress. If, as is much more likely, they shall prove unable or unwilling to protect the interests of all classes, and especially of those who never voluntarily rendered aid or comfort to the rebellion, then Congress should thrust them aside as the President did their predecessors, and create new States by the votes and voices of the loyal men of the South only, forever excluding the active and willing traitors. But under no circumstances will I consent to erect any such community into a State of the Union as long as standing armies are needed in that community to preserve the public peace and collect the public revenue.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio, resumed the floor.
 Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may move an adjournment.
 Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. I will do so.
 Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the House adjourn.
 The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 29, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. ALEXIS CASWELL, D. D., of Providence, Rhode Island.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received and been requested to present to the Senate the petition of James Dale Johnston, of Detroit, in the State of Michigan. The petition states that the petitioner is a naturalized citizen of the United States, having been born a subject of the Crown of Great Britain, and he suggests that, if he were taken with arms in his hands in war between the United States and Great Britain, he would be subject to execution as a traitor according to the laws of Great Britain, and he asks that such legislation may be had on the part of Congress as will protect him as an American citizen. If there be no objection, the petition will be received and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is so referred.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a resolution of the Legislature of Ohio, in favor of providing, in all laws which may be passed for the equalization of bounties, the issuing of land warrants, or for any additional compensation, that the same may be paid only to the soldier performing the service or his heirs; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. RIDDLE presented the petition of Clement Reeves, a citizen of Delaware, praying Congress to make him due allowance for land taken from him by order of the War Department in 1863, upon which a fortification called "Ten Gun Battery" was erected opposite Fort Delaware, for the defense of the Delaware river and the city of Philadelphia, which is still garrisoned by United States troops and held as a permanent fortification; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a memorial of a large number of citizens of the city of Buffalo, New York, protesting against the continuance of the reciprocity treaty and against any treaty affecting trade with Canada, and recommending that Congress shall retain this whole matter in its own hands, providing for intercourse with the British Provinces in the same manner, by tariff, as with foreign nations. I hardly know what direction this memorial should take, but I believe that similar memorials have generally gone to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I move the reference of this memorial to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Charles Grafton Page, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying that a patent may be issued to him for his invention of a magneto-electric apparatus for administering electricity as a remedy for diseases, a distinguishing feature of which invention is an automatic circuit breaker; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Monroe county, Pennsylvania, praying for such an amendment of the Constitution of the United States as will forever prohibit any State from making any distinction in civil rights and privileges among citizens of the United States on account of race or color; which was referred to the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the so-called confederate States.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Elisha Baxter, late colonel of the fourth regiment Arkansas mounted infantry, in the service of the United States, praying that the officers and men of that command may be compensated for services rendered and property lost, as they would have been had they been mustered on the day of their respective enlistments; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial from the St. Paul Board of Trade, asking for the improvement of the upper Mississippi river, and such arrangements with the British Provinces as will secure the freedom of the Welland and St. Lawrence canals to American vessels, and the enlargement of those canals by the Canadian government to a capacity sufficient to pass vessels of one thousand tons burden from Superior or Chicago to the ocean; and also that a conference by commissioners be held between the Governments of the United States and the English Provinces on this continent, with a view to the adjustment, on a liberal and satisfactory basis, of commercial relations upon the northern frontier of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of J. B. Braden, William S. Comb, and S. P. and P. F. Hodges, praying for compensation for articles furnished by them upon a requisition of the military authorities in September, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of assistant assessors of internal revenue in the thirtieth district of New York, praying that the compensation of assistant assessors may be fixed at four dollars per day; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a petition of citizens of Newbern, North Carolina, praying to be relieved from the payment of retrospective taxes claimed to be due under and by virtue of an ordinance of the convention of North Carolina passed and ratified on the 18th of October, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCKALEW presented ten petitions, signed by three hundred and sixty-five non-commissioned officers and privates of the volunteer army of the United States who enlisted in the years 1861 and 1862, praying for additional bounty so as to place them on an equal footing with soldiers who entered the service in 1863 and 1864; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of Jacob Tice and seventy-five others, citizens of Marion, Berks county, Pennsylvania, praying for an amendment of the internal revenue laws in respect to taxes assessed on clothing made to order by tailors for customers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLEY. I have received a preamble and resolutions passed by the Legislature of West Virginia in favor of the speedy passage of the bill before Congress in relation to the annexation of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson to the State of West Virginia, and requesting their representatives in both branches of Congress to use their efforts to have that done as speedily as possible. Inasmuch as that bill has been reported, and is now before the Senate, I move that these resolutions be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY also presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia in favor of the passage of the bill now pending in the House of Representatives granting lands to the State of West Virginia to aid in the construction of certain railroads; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. POMEROY presented a memorial of the delegates of the Cherokee nation of Indians, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to consolidate the Indian tribes and to establish civil government in the Indian Territory, and praying for indemnity for the loss of their cattle and crops, lost during the rebellion, and for an equitable settlement for their lands in Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That the bill for the relief of James Bawden and the papers relating thereto before the Senate of the United States, on the 12th of March, A. D. 1858, and now on file, be taken from the files and laid before the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers of Seth Eastman, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 193) for the relief of Mrs. William L. Herndon, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 50) in relation to the Freedmen's Bureau, have had the same under consideration and directed me to report it back to the Senate and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration. As the Senate has acted on this subject, I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 35) to grant one million acres of public lands for the benefit of public schools in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 48) amending the act of Congress entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," approved July 4, 1864, reported adversely thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 17th instant, requesting the President "to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, any letters from Major General Sheridan, commanding the military division of the Gulf, or from any other officer of the department of Texas, in regard to the present condition of affairs on the southwestern frontier of the United States, and especially in regard to any violation of neutrality on the part of the army now occupying the right bank of the Rio Grande," I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of War bearing date the 24th instant.

Concurring in his opinion that the publication of the correspondence at this time is not consistent with the public interest, the papers referred to in the accompanying report are for the present withheld.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1866.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. DAVIS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill making it a penal offense to form Jacobin clubs or other organizations to control the legislation of Congress, or the proceedings of either of the two Houses of Congress.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 102) to incorporate the National Mutual Protection Homestead Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS. On the first day of the present session I introduced a bill to reorganize the judiciary of the United States. Several other bills similar in their character have been introduced—one by the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] another by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.] I have corresponded pretty extensively with the judges of the northern States on the subject; I have taken their suggestions; I have availed myself of the other bills; and I have reconstructed the bill I originally introduced, and I now ask leave to introduce it as a new bill. It will be more convenient to have it in that shape than to introduce it as an amendment to one of the other bills, and I therefore ask leave to introduce a new bill for the purpose of having it printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, leave was given to introduce a bill (S. No. 103) to reorganize the judiciary of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 104) to promote military education; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 105) to grant the right of way to the Cascade Railroad Company through a military reserve in Washington Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. YATES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 106) to protect citizens of the United States in their civil and political rights; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for the reading of that bill in full.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to hear it.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States abolishes slavery in all the States and Territories of the United States, whereby all constitutions, laws, or regulations of any State or Territory in aid of slavery, or growing out of the same, are null and void; and whereas by virtue of said abolition of slavery all men in all the States and Territories are citizens and entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens, subject only to the legal disabilities applicable to white persons; and whereas it is also expressly provided that Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the aforesaid power abolishing slavery, which cannot be done without protecting all citizens against all restrictions, penalties, or deprivations of right resulting from slavery, and securing to them all their civil and political rights, including the elective franchise: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c. That no State or Territory of the United States shall, by any constitution, law, or other regulation whatever, heretofore in force or hereafter to be adopted, make or enforce, or in any manner recognize, any distinction between citizens of the United States, or of any State or Territory, on account of race, color, or condition; and that hereafter all citizens of the United States, without distinction of race, color, or condition, shall be protected in the full and equal enjoyment of all their civil and political rights, including the right of suffrage.

Mr. YATES. I move that the bill be printed, and referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 107) to provide for a term of the district court for the district of Minnesota, to be holden at the city of Winona, in said district; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 108) to increase the number of cadets in, and to raise the standard of admission to, the Military Academy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 109) to rescind the order of the President designating the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company to construct the branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Sioux City; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 110) for the relief of Samuel D. Le Compt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) tendering the thanks of Congress to Vice Admiral David G. Farragut, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command for their gallantry and good conduct in the action in Mobile bay on the 5th August, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

IMPROVEMENT OF PUBLIC GROUNDS.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire into the expediency of an appropriation for improving, grading, planting, draining, and inclosing the public grounds in the city of Washington, to be expended under the direction of the President of the United States in the execution of such plan or plans as he may adopt, and including also a plan for the extension, improvement, and inclosure of the grounds around the Capitol building.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. No. 193) for the relief of Mrs. William L. Herndon, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

HORSE RAILROAD IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 58) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of a portion of military reserve on St. Clair river, in the State of Michigan, for railroad purposes, have directed me to report it back to the Senate without amendment, and as it is a small matter and is of some little importance to the people in that locality, I am instructed to ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution on the day it is reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear what it is about.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, which authorizes the Secretary of War to grant to Guerdon O. Williams, of the city of Detroit, in the State of Michigan, and his associates, the use of so much of the military reserve on the St. Clair river, in the State of Michigan, known as the site of Fort Gratiot, as is necessary for extending a horse railroad from Port Huron City to the depot of the Port Huron and Detroit railroad, at such rental and upon such terms and conditions as to him may seem proper, reserving to the United States, however, the right of removing the rails, ties, and other parts of the road whenever the Secretary of War shall direct, without any claim or right for damages on the part of Williams and his associates, or their legal representatives.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply state to Senators that the depot of this Port Huron and Detroit railroad is about a mile and a half from the village. In order to accommodate the people of the place, a horse railroad has been incorporated, and it is necessary that that railroad should pass over a portion of this land. The land is not used; it can do no harm to grant this privilege, but the Secretary of War thought he had not the power to order it or to direct it to be done. This resolution gives that authority, reserving to the United States the right to take up the railway at any time whenever the Secretary of War shall so direct. I hope the joint resolution will be passed. It will be for the benefit of the people of that locality, and do the Government no harm whatever.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLLECTION OF SOLDIERS' CLAIMS.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 88, to restrict the expenses of collecting soldiers' claims against the Government.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the first amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia to the first section of the bill, which will be read.

Mr. CLARK. Before the question is taken on the amendments to that section, unless some Senator desires it, I wish to move an amendment, which is acceptable to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, striking out the whole of that section after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be read for information.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment; which was to strike out all of the first section after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That the fees of agents and attorneys for making out and causing to be executed the papers necessary to establish any claim of any commissioned officer or enlisted man of the regular Army, volunteers, or militia forces when called into the service of the United States, and for collecting such claim for bounty, arrears of pay, or other allowances, shall in no case exceed ten dollars: Provided, That the expenses incurred in acknowledging the necessary affidavits in such claims before a notary public, justice of the peace, or other public officer, shall be defrayed by the claimant, but shall in no case exceed the actual amount established by law for such acknowledgments.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the fees of agents and attorneys for making out and causing to be executed the necessary papers and for establishing and collecting any claim against the United States for bounty, arrears of pay, allowances, or gratuities for military service, whether due to the person performing such service, his heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, shall in no case exceed ten dollars unless the accounting officer allowing such claim shall, on application, certify a further sum to be just and proper.

Mr. CLARK. The object of the amendment is to provide for certain cases where the amount of the fee to be paid may be larger than ten dollars, but it is not to be paid unless the accounting officer who examines the claim certifies that it is just and proper. The provision limiting the fees to ten dollars will include undoubtedly very much the largest portion of the claims, and probably that sum is quite sufficient, and I give my support entirely to it, because there have been great enormities practiced by these claim agents; but still there is a class of cases, few in number, which may be provided for in the way suggested by this amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I am very willing to accept or assent to that amendment. I have made some inquiries in regard to it, and I find that there will be no difficulty in the matter. The other day I consulted with the Second Auditor on the subject, and he is of the opinion that the amendment will be practical in its operations, and I am perfectly willing to accept it. There may be the cases of some officers, and perhaps of a few privates, where the labor performed will be of more value than ten dollars, and in such a case the accounting officer may certify to the fact; but, as the Auditor says, where there will be one case of that kind, there will be thirty where the ten-dollar fee will be ample; and I have no doubt that in the administration of the law the accounting officers will be careful not to certify anything unless it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire seems plausible, but I suggest to him that the agents in distant portions of the country cannot make any of these arrangements with the Auditor's office, and hence this will be a proposition for the benefit of agents in this city, but will not inure to the benefit of agents in distant localities. I do not know upon what principle it can rest. I suppose it is upon the proposition that the soldiers who are discharged from the public service are not competent to take care of themselves. That has been the argument in favor of special legislation for the colored people; but I do not admit that it is a true argument in regard to the soldiers. Before they went into the Army they were competent to make contracts with their neighbors and lawyers just like anybody else, and I do not see why their having served in the Army and coming home discharged soldiers takes away from them their competency to transact any business they may have to do.

The effect of this bill will be to take away these cases from the management of the reliable lawyers of the country and to give them to a class of men whom you must be pursuing with the law all the time. I think we should encourage the soldiers in going to established and well-known lawyers. As a general thing I do not think lawyers having a good class of business would desire to do this sort of agency business, but still it is for the benefit of the soldiers that they should do it rather than mere agents who know nothing about the law. I think this measure will be an injury to the very persons that we want to protect. If the Senator from Massachusetts can show that the labor in preparing the papers in one case is worth just as much as in any other case, it would be an argument in favor of his bill, perhaps; but I presume it is worth as much to make out the papers in some particular cases as in three other cases. If ten dollars is the minimum, perhaps fifty dollars would not be a proper maximum, considering the amount of labor and the amount of skill required.

I do not think this is a good bill. I cannot see upon what principle it rests. I know the Senator the other day referred to the fact that this restriction was imposed upon the fees of pension agents, but I think that has no basis to rest upon. The argument there is that women, who are not very competent to manage their own affairs, are interested in pensions. Here is a case where we propose to regulate by law the contract of a man who is competent to manage his own affairs. I think this is an imputation upon the intelligence of the soldiers. If I had been a man competent to contract and make my own bargains with lawyers before I went into the Army, I should not thank Congress for making a law for me after I came back, in respect to those persons or any other.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If this matter had no connection with the Government itself, perhaps the argument of the Senator from Indiana might be controlling and conclusive; but the truth is, this is a business in which the Government itself is connected as a party, the party who proposes to pay, the party who proposes to secure the pay to whom it belongs; and therefore, in dealing in relation to a matter with which the Government itself is connected, I think it is no violation of the rights of citizens to make contracts, that the Government does impose terms upon which persons may engage in collecting claims against the Government in behalf of soldiers, to prevent the soldiers from being imposed upon. They may provide, without a violation of the rights of individuals, that the person who takes a claim against the Government to collect shall not charge on that claim more than a given amount. Ten dollars is the sum specified in this bill. No one claims that the precedent which was established in reference to the fees for the collection of pensions has led to any bad results, and therefore I am inclined to sustain this bill as it came to us from the committee.

Mr. CLARK. I do not think that the amendment that I have offered as a substitute for the first section of the bill is justly or fairly obnoxious to the criticism which has been made upon it by the Senator from Indiana, that it will be for the benefit of the claim agents in this District, or those who live near the Department, and not for the benefit of those who live remote from the Department. Now, as I understand the provision, wherever a man prosecutes a claim and obtains a bounty or a gratuity for a soldier, and thinks he should have more than the specified fee of ten dollars provided by law, he is in that case to make application to the Auditor or the accounting officer for an extra allowance in that individual case. There is no general arrangement made that such a man shall have more than the fee allowed by law; but when the agent transmits his papers to the Department for the purpose of getting the claim, if his services have been worth more than ten dollars, he can just as well transmit the evidence that they have been worth more than ten dollars as he can transmit the evidence that there is any claim at all. He can as well transmit that evidence from Minnesota as he can the papers in regard to the claim, and at the same time; and if the parties fairly agreed when the man undertook the work that the attorney should have more than ten dollars, and he transmits such an agreement, undoubtedly in a fair case the Auditor or accounting officer would allow it. The amendment is designed only for the protection of those individuals who go to these agents casually and without making an agreement, or who are taken advantage of by the prosecuting claim agents.

I heartily concur in the object sought to be accomplished by the Senator from Massachusetts. It would be unfair, it would be cruel, to permit these harpies who live upon the blood of the men who have fought your battles, to take away from them the bounties and gratuities which the Government may offer them, as they do. It would be heartless to permit them, under false or spurious names, to get this money in their hands, and then, by the formation of new firms, moving away, or anything of that kind, to cheat the soldiers out of it. The Government is bound to protect the men who have fought its battles, and it ought to do it, and I hope it will do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent, the amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia to the first section will be laid aside, and the question will be taken upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, to strike out the whole of the first section after the enacting clause, and to insert what has been read. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia to the second section of the bill will be read.

The Secretary read the next amendment, which was in section two, line five, after the word "allowances" to insert "or gratuities," and in line six, after the word "contract" to insert the word "or;" so that it will read:

That any agent or attorney who shall directly or indirectly demand or receive any greater compensation than is provided for by the first section of this act for his services in the collection of any claim for bounty, arrears of pay, or other allowances or gratuities, or who shall contract or agree to prosecute or collect any such claim, on the condition that he shall receive a per cent. upon any portion of such claim, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line ten, to strike out the word "to" and insert "from," and in line twelve to strike out the word "fined" and insert "punished by fine," and in line thirteen to insert the word "by" before the word "imprisonment;" so that the clause will read:

Or who shall wrongfully withhold the payment of the proceeds of such claim from the claimant shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for every such offense, be punished by fine not exceeding $300, or by imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the amendments reported from the committee. The bill is still before the Senate, and open to amendment.

Mr. CLARK. To make the second section conform to the first as amended, I move further to amend that section by inserting after the word "receive" at the end of the second line the words, "without the certificate of the accounting officer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend that section in the eighth line by inserting after the word "claim" the words, "or who shall receive such per cent." As the section now stands, it provides simply for punishing the man who shall agree to receive any greater compensation than is provided in the first section. I want to provide also a punishment for the receiving of it as well as the agreeing to do it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend the same section by inserting after the word "claim" at the end of the ninth line the words "or any part thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If I believed that the Congress of the United States had any authority to pass such a bill as this, and it would do any good, I would cheerfully vote for it. I have no doubt it is true, as stated by Senators on this floor, that great wrongs have been perpetrated by agents in the collection of the claims of soldiers, but I know of no authority of the Congress of the United States to meddle with that evil. There is a remedy for it, sir, and that remedy is available to every soldier in the United States, and it will do him more good if he will observe it than all the enactments Congress can make on the subject; and that is, instead of intrusting the collection of his claims to irresponsible agents, persons who advertise that they will specially attend to this business, to go to the best, most honest, and able lawyer in his neighborhood, and get him to attend to his business, and he will attend to it properly. If the soldiers will pursue that course, just as you and I, sir, would do in any private transactions in the business of life where we might need an attorney, they will save a great deal more to themselves, and be a great deal more benefited than they can possibly be by such an enactment as this. As I do not believe Congress has any authority to pass this bill, and as I believe it will be productive of no good whatever, I ask for the yeas and nays on its passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts who introduced this bill that there is an evil provided against in it which I think it is competent for Congress to reach, and that is, the refusal or failure on the part of any agent or attorney to pay the money over after he shall have collected it; but the fine imposed by the bill I believe is only $300. In many instances they collect much more money than that. If you want to prevent that refusal or failure, the fine ought to be at least as high as the amount of money that will come into the hands of the agent. I doubt if that amount of fine will accomplish what the Senator desires. I believe Congress can punish that, but I do not think they can regulate a contract.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know that I precisely understand the Senator.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe the fine that may be imposed upon a party who fails to pay the money over is limited to $300. I suggest that that fine is not large enough, if you intend to prevent that offense.

Mr. WILSON. It is punishable by a fine of $300, or by imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both. I think the punishment is quite sufficient.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Imprisonment may be added besides the fine?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir; a fine of $300, or imprisonment for two years, or both.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, resulted—yeas 34, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Cragin, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Stockton—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Conness, Creswell, Doolittle, Henderson, McDougall, Nesmith, Ramsey, and Wright—8.

So the bill was passed.

PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Friday, which is the bill (S. No. 61) to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. DIXON. With the consent of the Senator from Illinois, I will ask that the bill (S. No. 71) relative to the sale of postage stamps and stamped envelopes on credit be now taken up. I think it will take but a very short time to pass it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume the Senator can pass it in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. DIXON. I will not urge it if the Senator objects, but I think it is of importance and ought to be passed at once.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Probably it will not give rise to debate, and I presume there will be time to pass it in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. DIXON. I will not press the motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before proceeding with the bill under consideration, I desire to offer an amendment, to insert after the word "that," in the third line of the first section, the words, "all persons of African descent born in the United States are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States and;" so that the section will read:

That all persons of African descent born in the United States are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, and there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery, &c.

Mr. President, I regard the bill to which the attention of the Senate is now called as the most important measure that has been under its consideration since the adoption of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. That amendment declared that all persons in the United States should be free. This measure is intended to give effect to that declaration and secure to all persons within the United States practical freedom. There is very little importance in the general declaration of abstract truths and principles unless they can be carried into effect, unless the persons who are to be affected by them have some means of availing themselves of their benefits. Of what avail was the immortal declaration "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and "that to secure these rights Governments are instituted among men," to the millions of the African race in this country who were ground down and degraded and subjected to a slavery more intolerable and cruel than the world ever before knew? Of what avail was it to the citizen of Massachusetts, who, a few years ago, went to South Carolina to enforce a constitutional right in court, that the Constitution of the United States declared that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States? And of what avail will it now be that the Constitution of the United States has declared that slavery shall not exist, if in the late slaveholding States laws are to be enacted and enforced depriving persons of African descent of privileges which are essential to freemen?

It is the intention of this bill to secure those rights. The laws in the slaveholding States have made a distinction against persons of African descent on account of their color, whether free or slave. I have before me the statutes of Mississippi. They provide that if any colored person, any free negro or mulatto, shall come into that State for the purpose of residing there, he shall be sold into slavery for life. If any person of African descent residing in that State travels from one county to another without having a pass or a certificate of his freedom, he is liable to be committed to jail and to be dealt with as a person who is in the State without authority. Other provisions of the statute prohibit any negro or mulatto from having fire-arms; and one provision of the statute declares that for "exercising the functions of a minister of the Gospel free negroes and mulattoes, on conviction, may be punished by any number of lashes not exceeding thirty-nine on the bare back, and shall pay the costs." Other provisions of the statute of Mississippi prohibit a free negro or mulatto from keeping a house of entertainment, and subject him to trial before two justices of the peace and five slaveholders for violating the provisions of this law. The statutes of South Carolina make it a highly penal offense for any person, white or colored, to teach slaves; and similar provisions are to be found running through all the statutes of the late slaveholding States.

When the constitutional amendment was adopted and slavery abolished, all these statutes became null and void, because they were all passed in aid of slavery, for the purpose of maintaining and supporting it. Since the abolition of slavery, the Legislatures which have assembled in the insurrectionary States have passed laws relating to the freedmen, and in nearly all the States they have discriminated against them. They deny them certain rights, subject them to severe penalties, and still impose upon them the very restrictions which were imposed upon them in consequence of the existence of slavery, and before it was abolished. The purpose of the bill under consideration is to destroy all these discriminations, and to carry into effect the constitutional amendment. The first section of the bill, as it is now proposed to be amended, declares that all persons of African descent shall be citizens of the United States, and—

That there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; but the inhabitants of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

This section is the basis of the whole bill. The other provisions of the bill contain the necessary machinery to give effect to what are declared to be the rights of all persons in the first section, and the question will arise, has Congress authority to pass such a bill? Has Congress authority to give practical effect to the great declaration that slavery shall not exist in the United States? If it has not, then nothing has been accomplished by the adoption of the constitutional amendment. In my judgment, Congress has this authority. It is difficult, perhaps, to define accurately what slavery is and what liberty is. Liberty and slavery are opposite terms; one is opposed to the other. We know that in a civil government, in organized society, no such thing can exist as natural or absolute liberty. Natural liberty is defined to be the—"Power of acting as one thinks fit, without any restraint or control, unless by the law of nature, being a right inherent in us by birth, and one of the gifts of God to man in his creation, when he imbued him with the faculty of will."

But every man who enters society gives up a part of this natural liberty, which is the liberty of the savage, the liberty which the wild beast has, for the advantages he obtains in the protection which civil government gives him. Civil liberty, or the liberty which a person enjoys in society, is thus defined by Blackstone:

"Civil liberty is no other than natural liberty, so far restrained by human laws and no further, as is necessary and expedient for the general advantage of the public."

That is the liberty to which every citizen is entitled; that is the liberty which was intended to be secured by the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States originally, and more especially by the amendment which has recently been adopted; and in a note to Blackstone's Commentaries it is stated that—

"In this definition of civil liberty it ought to be understood, or rather expressed, that the restraints introduced by the law should be equal to all, or as much so as the nature of things will admit."

Then, sir, I take it that any statute which is not equal to all, and which deprives any citizen of civil rights which are secured to other citizens, is an unjust encroachment upon his liberty; and is, in fact, a badge of servitude which, by the Constitution, is prohibited. We may, perhaps, arrive at a more correct definition of the term "citizen of the United States" by referring to that clause of the Constitution which I have already quoted, and which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." What rights are secured to the citizens of each State under that provision? Such fundamental rights as belong to every free person. Story, in his Commentaries, in commenting upon this clause of the Constitution of the United States, says:

"The intention of this clause was to confer on citizens, if one may so say, a general citizenship, and to communicate all the privileges and immunities which the citizens of the same State would be entitled to under the like circumstances."

There have been several decisions of courts upon this clause of the Constitution. It was decided by the general court of the State of Maryland (Chase and Duval, justices) that this section meant that the citizens of all the States should have the peculiar advantage of acquiring and holding real as well as personal property, and that such property should be protected and secured by the laws of the State in the same manner as the property of the citizens of the State is protected. It meant that such property shall not be liable to any tax or burdens which the property of the citizen is not subject to. It may also mean that, as creditors, they shall be on the same footing with the State creditor in the payment of the debts of a deceased debtor. It secures and protects personal rights. (Campbell vs. Morris, 3 Harris and McHenry, 535.)

This clause of the Constitution, according to the decision of the Indiana court made in 1797, "secures and protects personal rights" and gives to every person who is a citizen of one State the same rights to hold property, the same personal rights, that the citizen of that State has.

A decision by the supreme court of Massachusetts upon this clause of the Constitution declares that—

"The privileges and immunities secured to the people of each State in every other State can be applied only in case of removal from one State into another. By such removal they become citizens of the adopted State without naturalization, and have a right to sue and be sued as citizens; and yet this privilege is qualified and not absolute, for they cannot enjoy the right of suffrage or of eligibility to office without such term of residence as shall be prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State into which they shall remove. They shall have the privileges and immunities of citizens; that is, they shall not be deemed aliens, but may take and hold real estate; and may, according to the laws of such State, eventually enjoy the full rights of citizenship without the necessity of being naturalized."—6 Pickering, 92, Abbott vs. Bayley.

But, sir, the decision most elaborate upon this clause of the Constitution is to be found in Washington's Circuit Court Reports, in a case which was reserved for consideration after argument. I will read several sentences from the opinion of the circuit judge, because it will be seen that he enumerates the very rights belonging to a citizen of the United States which are set forth in the first section of this bill. He says:

"The next question is, whether this act infringes that section of the Constitution which declares that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States'?"

"The inquiry is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are in their nature fundamental; which belong of right to the citizens of all free Governments; and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several States which compose this Union, from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are it would perhaps be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: protection by the Government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind; and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the Government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole. The right of a citizen of one State to pass through, or to reside in any other State, for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of the State; to take, hold, and dispose of property, either real or personal, and an exemption from higher taxes or impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the State, may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens, which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental; to which may be added the elective franchise, as regulated and established by the laws or constitution of the State in which it is to be exercised."—Corfield vs. Corryell, 4 Washington's Circuit Court Reports, page 380.

This judge goes further than the bill under consideration, and he lays it down as his opinion that under this clause of the Constitution, securing to the citizen of each State all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States of the United States, a person who is a citizen in one State and goes to another is even entitled to the elective franchise; but at all events he is entitled to the great fundamental rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and the right to travel, to go where he pleases. This is a right which belongs to the citizen of each State.

Now, sir, if that be so, this being the construction as settled by judicial decisions to be put upon the clause of the Constitution to which I have adverted, how much more are the native-born citizens of the State itself entitled to these rights! In my judgment, persons of African descent, born in the United States, are as much citizens as white persons who are born in the country. I know that in the slaveholding States a different opinion has obtained. The people of those States have not regarded the colored race as citizens, and on that principle many of their laws making discriminations between the whites and the colored people are based; but it is competent for Congress to declare, under the Constitution of the United States, who are citizens. If there were any question about it, it would be settled by the passage of a law declaring all persons born in the United States to be citizens thereof. That this bill proposes to do. Then they will be entitled to the rights of citizens. And what are they? The great fundamental rights set forth in this bill: the right to acquire property, the right to go and come at pleasure, the right to enforce rights in the courts, to make contracts, and to inherit and dispose of property. These are the very rights that are set forth in this bill as appertaining to every free-man.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. If the gentleman will permit me, before he passes from this subject I should like him to explain, if these Africans are not now citizens of the United States, where is the authority by law of Congress to make them citizens?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress the right to provide uniform rules of naturalization.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. For the admission of foreigners.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not necessarily of foreigners.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. For the naturalization of foreigners, if I recollect the language.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from West Virginia will look into the statutes, he will find that it has happened in the history of the Government more than once that Congress by general act has naturalized a whole people. I think there was an act of that kind in reference to the Stockbridge Indians, an act of that character making citizens of the United States of the people of Texas and the people of Florida I think. There have been several general laws of that character; and the authority under the Constitution of the United States to declare who shall be citizens of the United States is, as I understand, vested in Congress and nowhere else. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has handed me the constitutional clause on this subject, which declares that Congress shall have power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." Nothing is said about foreigners.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I perceived my mistake before the gentleman read the clause.

Mr. TRUMBULL. So, sir, I take it that it is competent for Congress to declare these persons to be citizens. They being now free and citizens of the United States, as citizens they are entitled, as I have undertaken to show, to the great fundamental rights belonging to free citizens, and we have a right to protect them in the enjoyment of them.

Now, sir, referring again to that other clause of the Constitution upon which there have been judicial constructions, is it not manifest that it was competent for the Congress of the United States to have passed a law that would have protected Mr. Hoar, who went from Massachusetts to South Carolina for the purpose of testing a question in the courts? Would it not have been competent, under these decisions, for Congress to have passed a law punishing any person who should have undertaken to deprive him of this right, and to have vested the proper authorities with power if necessary to call upon the Army and Navy of the United States to protect him in this right? I apprehend it would.

Then, under the constitutional amendment which we have now adopted, and which declares that slavery shall no longer exist, and which authorizes Congress by appropriate legislation to carry this provision into effect, I hold that we have a right to pass any law which, in our judgment, is deemed appropriate, and which will accomplish the end in view, secure freedom to all people in the United States. The various State laws to which I have referred—and there are many others—although they do not make a man an absolute slave, yet deprive him of the rights of a freeman; and it is perhaps difficult to draw the precise line, to say where freedom ceases and slavery begins, but a law that does not allow a colored person to go from one county to another is certainly a law in derogation of the rights of a freeman. A law that does not allow a colored person to hold property, does not allow him to teach, does not allow him to preach, is certainly a law in violation of the rights of a freeman, and being so may properly be declared void.

Without going elaborately into this question, as my design was to state rather than argue the grounds upon which I place this bill, I will only add on this branch of the subject that the clause of the Constitution under which we are called to act in my judgment vests Congress with the discretion of selecting that "appropriate legislation" which it is believed will best accomplish the end and prevent slavery.

Then, sir, the only question is, will this bill be effective to accomplish the object, for the first section will amount to nothing more than the declaration in the Constitution itself unless we have the machinery to carry it into effect. A law is good for nothing without a penalty, without a sanction to it, and that is to be found in the other sections of the bill. The second section provides:

That any person who under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject or cause to be subjected any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by this act, or to different punishment, pains, or penalties on account of such person having at any time been held in a condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of white persons, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

This is the valuable section of the bill so far as protecting the rights of freedmen is concerned. That they are entitled to be free we know. Being entitled to be free under the Constitution, that we have a right to enact such legislation as will make them free, we believe; and that can only be done by punishing those who undertake to deny them their freedom. When it comes to be understood in all parts of the United States that any person who shall deprive another of any right or subject him to any punishment in consequence of his color or race will expose himself to fine and imprisonment, I think such acts will soon cease.

I think it will only be necessary to go into the late slaveholding States and subject to fine and imprisonment one or two in a State, and the most prominent ones I should hope at that, to break up this whole business.

The third section of the bill provides for giving to the courts of the United States jurisdiction over all persons committing offenses against the provisions of this act, and also over the cases of persons who are discriminated against by State laws or customs. It provides further that no person whose equal civil rights are denied him in the State courts shall be tried by those courts for any offense, but that he shall have a right to remove his cause into the courts of the United States, and be there tried if it be for an offense against the laws of the United States, according to those laws, and if it be for an offense which is not provided for by the laws of the United States, then according to the common law as modified by the statutes and constitution of the State where the offense is committed, so far as they are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The other provisions of this bill I shall not go over in detail. Most of them are copied from the late fugitive slave act, adopted in 1850 for the purpose of returning fugitives from slavery into slavery again. The act that was passed at that time for the purpose of punishing persons who should aid negroes to escape to freedom is now to be applied by the provisions of this bill to the punishment of those who shall undertake to keep them in slavery. Surely we have the authority to enact a law as efficient in the interests of freedom, now that freedom prevails throughout the country, as we had in the interest of slavery when it prevailed in a portion of the country.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the honorable Senator a question here. I have not had an opportunity of examining the bill very fully; but, as I understand the bill, this kind of case might occur: the State judge might be honestly of opinion that a State law was not in conflict with the United States law, and yet, as I understand it, he may be dragged into the United States court and punished in that court as a criminal by fine and imprisonment. I would ask if that has been well considered; if it is supposed that that kind of practice will work in this country? Would it not be better, if this man has mistaken the law and has executed some law which is in conflict with United States laws, that a writ of error should lie to the Supreme Court of the Union, and have it corrected in that way?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe that a bill is pending on your table now to allow writs of error in certain criminal cases to be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States; but, sir, the answer to the Senator from Pennsylvania is this: it requires a union of act and intention to commit a crime. A man must intend to commit it; and if an honest judge misconceives the law, and makes a mistake in judgment without any intention to disregard the law, would any jury in America convict him? He will be in no danger.

Mr. COWAN. Then I will ask if that does not come in conflict with another principle of law—whether a judge in a criminal court can be held responsible for the integrity of his intentions as to the decisions he makes?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That would involve many considerations, and they will be settled by the courts when they arise. If he is not responsible, I have faith that the judges of the United States courts will so decide. The bill provides that persons who subject others to punishment in consequence of race or color and not in consequence of crime, shall themselves be punished, and that this may be done in the United States courts.

The various other provisions of this bill make it the duty of the marshals and deputy marshals, the commissioners of the United States courts, the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, the district attorneys, and others, to be vigilant in the enforcement of the act. They provide what fees shall be paid and the manner of proceeding, just as efficiently, I believe, and not more efficiently, than was provided by the old laws for the apprehension and punishment of a person who aided a slave to escape; and if those laws were constitutional, and they were so held, this law must be constitutional.

The last section of the bill provides "that it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to prevent the violation, and enforce the due execution, of this act." It is intended, if this bill becomes a law, to clothe the officers charged with its execution with all the power necessary to make it effective. This last clause is a section copied from a statute of 1838 in reference to another subject. That it is competent to confer such authority I have no doubt. The Constitution itself says Congress shall have authority "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union;" and whenever the civil tribunals, in the ordinary course of proceedings, are unable to enforce the laws it is competent to call to their assistance the Army and Navy and the whole power of the Government, if need be, to see that the law is executed and observed.

With this bill passed into a law and efficiently executed we shall have secured freedom in fact and equality in civil rights to all persons in the United States. There will be no objection to this bill that it undertakes to confer judicial powers upon some other authority than the courts. It may be assailed as drawing to the Federal Government powers that properly belong to "States;" but I apprehend, rightly considered, it is not obnoxious to that objection. It will have no operation in any State where the laws are equal, where all persons have the same civil rights without regard to color or race. It will have no operation in the State of Kentucky when her slave code and all her laws discriminating between persons on account of race or color shall be abolished.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I beg leave to ask the Senator how he interprets the term "civil rights," in the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The first section of the bill defines what I understand to be civil rights: the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue and be sued, and to give evidence, to inherit, purchase, sell, lease, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit to all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property. These I understand to be civil rights, fundamental rights belonging to every man as a free man, and which under the Constitution as it now exists we have a right to protect every man in.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Allow me to remark that I think all those rights should be conceded. Do I understand that this bill does not go further than to give protection to the enjoyment of life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness and the protection of the courts, and to have justice administered to all? Do I understand that it is not designed to involve the question of political rights?

Mr. TRUMBULL. This bill has nothing to do with the political rights or status of parties. It is confined exclusively to their civil rights, such rights as should appertain to every free man.

Having stated this much in regard to the object of the bill and its main features, I submit it to the Senate, and shall not further occupy its attention at the present time, and perhaps not at all unless it should be to reply to suggestions which may be made by others.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I regard this bill as one of the most dangerous that was ever introduced into the Senate of the United States, or to which the attention of the American people was ever invited. During the last four or five years I have sat in this Chamber and witnessed the introduction of bills into this body which I thought obnoxious to many very grave and serious constitutional objections; but I have never since I have been a member of the body seen a bill so fraught with danger, so full of mischief, as the bill now under consideration. Deeming it to be of this character, duty to my country, duty to my State, duty to myself as a man, as a citizen, and as a legislator, duty to my children, and duty to my fellow-citizens everywhere, demands that I should utter my protest against its enactment into a law. Before, however, I proceed to consider it in the light of the Constitution as it existed previous to the recent amendment, let me notice the basis of authority for it as claimed by the honorable Senator from Illinois.

I presume that honorable Senator would not contend that, independently of the constitutional amendment, Congress had a right to enact this law, although I know that many have claimed powers equally extensive. But from the argument of the honorable Senator, I infer that the sole basis of authority in his judgment for passing the bill is the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery. If that be so, it is admitted that before the adoption of that amendment Congress had not the right to enact such a law as this. Let us consider then for one moment whether the adoption of that amendment gave to Congress such an authority.

What was that amendment? That neither slavery nor involuntary servitude should exist in the United States, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party should have been duly convicted. Now, here is a complete answer, in my judgment, to the argument of the honorable Senator, based upon the authority conferred by that amendment. Before and at the time of the adoption of that amendment the people of the United States were composed of persons of different races, the two main portions of which were white and black; the whites were free; a portion of the black population were free and a portion were slaves. In the State of Maryland about one half of the black population were free and one half slaves. In my own State there were about ten free negroes to one slave. In Kentucky and in most of the slaveholding States there were large free negro populations, as we supposed.

I should like to know whether persons belonging to the African race in the State of Maryland, and the State of Delaware, and the other slaveholding States, who had been emancipated by their owners either by deed or will, or who were never in bondage, were, at the time of the adoption of the constitutional amendment, free or slave. Were they not freemen? What was the objection urged by many against the enactment of the fugitive slave law? It was that under that enactment a freedman—a free colored man, as they called him, a free negro, as I uniformly call him—might be kidnapped, carried far from his home, and reduced to slavery. Had the Congress of the United States, previous to the adoption of the amendment, the power to pass this law, to say that the free negroes in the States of Maryland and Delaware, and the other slaveholding States, or the free negroes all over the United States, should be the equals of the white man before the law, and possess the powers which this bill proposes to confer? Had you the power, before the enactment of the constitutional amendment, to pass such a law? If you had not, did the passage of that amendment, setting free that portion who were in slavery, and putting them on an equality in reference to their status with the free negroes that then existed in the United States, give you the power to legislate beyond the persons you set free and in reference to the whole negro race in the United States, a portion of which were free before? Is the amendment to the Constitution so potential that if there was but one slave negro in the United States you could, under and by virtue of the clause which says you may carry the amendment into effect by appropriate legislation, bestow all the rights which this bill proposes to bestow upon the whole free negro population of the United States? Sir, it needs but a statement of the facts to show that under the constitutional amendment you have no such power. If you have the power under it, you had the power before the amendment to do the same thing in reference to that portion of the negro population who were not in a state of slavery but who were free.

Mr. President, I will not say that such an exercise of power as is now proposed was not contemplated by those who voted for the amendment to the Constitution; but certainly they did not avow it upon the floor of this Chamber. It does not of itself declare, and human ingenuity cannot torture it into meaning that the Congress of the United States shall invade the States and attempt to regulate property and personal rights within the States any further than refers simply and solely to the condition and status of slavery. I admit that if instead of declaring that hereafter neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist in the United States except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, it had declared that hereafter there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery, but the inhabitants of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property—if instead of being the amendment which you passed it had been that, and if then it had said that by appropriate legislation you might carry such an amendment into effect, you would have the power to pass appropriate acts to carry it into effect, because your acts would have had reference and relevancy to the subject-matter of the amendment. Your acts then would have been constitutional, because there would have been a logical and legal connection between your amendment as it would in that case have existed and your proposed acts to carry it into effect. But Congress has passed no such constitutional amendment as that. The States have simply said by adopting that amendment that the status or condition of slavery in this country shall not longer exist—the condition in which one man belongs to another, which gives to that other a right to appropriate the profits of his labor to his own use and to control his person. That is what it said; and it is said in reference to that, that you may by appropriate legislation exercise power; and it has not said that you may exercise power in reference to anything else. The attempt now under the power given, which relates simply and solely to one subject-matter, the abolition of the status or condition of slavery, to confer civil rights which are wholly distinct and unconnected with the status or condition of slavery, is an attempt unwarranted by any method or process of sound reasoning.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to put a question to the honorable Senator from Delaware, with his permission; I do not intend to interrupt the tenor of his remarks. My question is whether the amendment of the Constitution does not render persons who were formerly slaves freemen, whether that be not its intention and effect in law?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I answer the honorable Senator with pleasure. The operation, the effect of that amendment is simply to say that a person who heretofore was a slave of another shall be no longer his slave, and it operates no further. It bestows no rights further than to relieve him from the burdens of servitude and slavery. A man may be a free man and not possess the same civil rights as other men. The time was in England when an accused party was not entitled to counsel to aid him in his defense. Nevertheless he was a free man. If not, whose slave was he? Who could control his person or his actions? Who could appropriate to his own use the labor of such a one? This example will serve to illustrate my meaning and confirms as true the position I assume. If you intended to bestow upon the freed slave all the rights of a free citizen, you ought to have gone further in your constitutional amendment, and provided that not only the status and condition of slavery should not exist, but that there should be no inequality in civil rights.

Whether I have satisfied the mind of any Senator or any person in reference to this point, I at least have satisfied my own mind that my proposition is as clear as the sun at noonday. Then, sir, that being the basis upon which the honorable Senator from Illinois founds his argument, the sole authority which he claims for this bill, I might content myself with dismissing the subject here. I shall not follow the honorable Senator into a consideration of the manner in which slaves were treated in the southern States, nor the privileges that have been denied to them by the laws of the States. I think the time for shedding tears over the poor slave has well nigh passed in this country. The tears which the honest white people of this country have been made to shed from the oppressive acts of this Government in its various departments during the last four years call more loudly for my sympathies than those tears which have been shedding and dropping and dropping for the last twenty years in reference to the poor, oppressed slave—dropping from the eyes of strong-minded women and weak-minded men, until, becoming a mighty flood, they have swept away, in their resistless force, every trace of constitutional liberty in this country.

Mr. President, this bill is founded, in my judgment, in an utter misconception of the true theory, nature, and character of our system of government. Can any man believe that the founders of this Republic, the intellectual giants of the world, in the possession of freedom and self-government under their State governments, enjoying all the rights of free government before they entered into this Union, would have ever entered into the Union, which was intended simply as a contract and agreement of union and government between them for common purposes, if they had supposed that in the short term of eighty years their children would be subjected to the absolute control and the omnipotent will of the Federal Congress? I do not believe it. Let us see whether this bill in its provisions is not a total subversion of the true theory and character of our Federal system.

If I refer to the A, B, C of elementary political principles in our history, pardon me. It has become necessary, it seems, not only for the people themselves but for American statesmen to familiarize themselves with the most elementary truths and principles of political science in reference to our Government. If Congress does not get this power under the amendment to the Constitution, as I have endeavored to show, where do they get it?

The time was when there were thirteen colonies, not States, upon the continent of North America, separate, distinct colonies, and colonies of Great Britain. They were not united: they were political communities, distinct in themselves, but over which what was called the parent country exercised control. Neither of those colonies was connected with the others, or owed to the others any duty, or was under to the other any obligation. They remained in that condition until the 4th of July, 1776, when for the first time those independent colonies became, what? They became independent States. Was there any Constitution existing among them or bond of union at that time which gave control to the one over the other or bound it by any tie of obligation? They united together so far as in common council to declare their independence of Great Britain, and they styled themselves in that immortal Declaration "independent States." As independent States, having a common interest, they chose to wage a common warfare, still preserving each its own independent existence; and to prove that this was their condition, let me ask, was there ever an indictment or trial for treason against them as a united people during the progress of the revolutionary war? Not one; but when treason was committed against any one of the States by adhering to King George, the party was indicted in the courts of the State, he was tried for an offense against the State, and not for an offense against the United Colonies.

In 1778 these separate and independent States united in Articles of Confederation by their separate names, each reserving to itself its own absolute sovereignty, and agreeing upon certain conditions for certain general common purposes and benefits. Thus they continued until the treaty of peace in 1783, when the mother country by that treaty acknowledged them to be, what? An independent United States? An independent, united people, Government, or nation? No, sir; but naming each separate State by name, she acknowledged each to be a separate independent State. As separate and independent States they continued until the formation of the Federal Union in 1787. In the Declaration of Independence they declare themselves independent States. The independent colonies united for common purposes of defense by the declaration of their independence of Great Britain, became independent States, united for the common purpose of making that declaration good and effective. The Union of 1787 ordains and establishes the Constitution for the "United States of America." States in the Declaration of Independence, States in the Articles of Confederation, and States in the Constitution evidence the independent existence and sovereignty of the States respectively. The ratification of the Constitution was by the States, and not by the majority of all the people, nor by a majority of all the States. This ratification was at different times, and by each State acting for itself alone. The words "we, the people of the United States," employed in the preamble to the Constitution, do not in the least conflict with this proposition. These words mean the same and no more, as we, the people of Delaware; we, the people of Maryland; we, the people of Pennsylvania, and we, the people of the other States respectively; and the meaning is the same as if the names of the several States had been inserted in that preamble; and this is evidenced by the several and separate ratifications of the Constitution and the form of such ratification. The style or title of United States was proper to describe a confederation or union of independent States, but improper to describe a consolidated nation. No nation or State of America existed; but States did exist. The Constitution was made by and for them, and not by or for the nation or State of America. The people of each State, or each State constituted by a people, conveyed to a Federal authority, organized by States, a portion of State sovereign powers, and retained all other State sovereign powers. If the powers ceded or granted were sovereign, so the powers retained were sovereign. The mode of amending the Constitution sustains the correctness of the general proposition I have announced. Such amendments must be proposed to each separate State, and receive the ratification of each separately.

If the power to pass such an act as this exists anywhere, it must exist in the Constitution as originally framed. Sir, was it ever pretended by any statesman before that that Constitution conferred such a power as this? Look at the powers enumerated in the Constitution and see whether it is possible for the ingenuity of man to arrive at the conclusion that any such power exists; for, Mr. President, the Constitution is the bond of agreement according to the terms of which the States agreed to live together, and all the powers which Congress possesses are found in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution. They are: "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts," &c., to "borrow money," to "establish uniform rules of naturalization," to "coin money," to "provide for the punishment of counterfeiting," to "establish post offices," to "promote the progress of science and arts," to "constitute tribunals" of justice, to "define and punish piracy," &c., to "declare war," to "raise and support armies," to "provide a Navy," to "make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," to "provide for calling forth the militia," &c., to "provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia," &c., to "exercise exclusive legislation in all cases" over this District, or such district as should be established as the seat of Government, and to "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

That is the sole, almost the entire, authority given under the Constitution to this Federal Government. Under any of these powers granted by the States to the Federal Government does any such power as that now claimed exist, for, mark you, all powers not granted by that instrument are reserved to the States respectively or to the people?

I propose now to examine this bill to see that its provisions are such that it cannot come within the power of Congress, either under the Constitution before it was amended, or under the Constitution as recently amended abolishing slavery in the United States.

The honorable Senator from Illinois has avowed that he does not propose by this bill to confer any political power. I have no doubt the Senator is perfectly honest in that declaration, and that he personally does not mean to give any political power, for instance the right of voting, not only to the freedmen, but to the whole race of negroes; but the intention of the Senator in framing this bill will not govern its construction, and I have not the least doubt that should it be enacted and become a law, it will receive very generally, if not universally, the construction that it does confer a right of voting in the States; and why do I say so? Says the Senator, "It confers no political power; I do not mean that." The question is not what the Senator means, but what is the legitimate meaning and import of the terms employed in the bill. Its words are, "That there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities." What are civil rights? What are the rights which you, I, or any citizen of this country enjoy? What is the basis, the foundation of them all? They are divisible into but two classes; one, those rights which we derive from nature, and the other those rights which we derive from government. I will admit that you may divide and subdivide the rights which you derive from government into different classifications; you may call some, for the sake of convenience and more definiteness of meaning, political; you may call others civil.

But here you use a generic term which in its most comprehensive signification includes every species of right that man can enjoy other than those the foundation of which rests exclusively in nature and in the law of nature. Now, I ask the honorable Senator to show me, if he can, any origin of a right he has or can have that is not derived either from nature or from government. I shall enter into no discussion or argument in reference to what are the rights man has by nature; they are familiar to the legal mind and to the thoughtful student. The rights which a man has under government are defined in the fundamental or other law of the Government under which he lives. How do I possess the right of voting in the State of Delaware? Is that a civil right? A civil right I define to be a right belonging to the citizen, and which he possesses only by virtue of citizenship. I know of no clearer definition of civil rights than that; the rights which I have by reason of the law of the State under which I live, whether they be rights secured by the fundamental law, the constitution of the State, or be secured by enactments of the Legislature.

The right to vote is not a natural right; I did not possess it by nature, I only possess it by virtue of law. The constitution of the State, which is the fundamental law, bestows it; it says when I arrive at the age of twenty-one years, and have resided in that State for one year, I shall have the right of voting. I possess it in no other manner. I hold it by no other tenure. It is conferred upon me by law. It is a right derived from law, and it pertains to me as a citizen of my State; and pertaining to me as a citizen of my State, it is a civil right, and is a right of no other class or character.

Sir, can there be any doubt about this, when you look at the very frame of this bill and consider the words which it employs? If the honorable Senator from Illinois had not disclaimed such an intention when the question was propounded to him by the honorable Senator from California, I should have thought that he could not have taxed his ingenuity to a greater extent than it seems to have been taxed if he had meant to secure the right of voting to the negroes. Let us read this first section. There is a cat in this tub of meal, and I want to frighten the cat out of the tub if I cannot get it out in any other way:

That there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; but the inhabitants of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right—

Now, here is what the honorable Senator says he means by it, and no doubt he does; but the question is not what he means, but what the courts will say the law means—shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property;—

That is where the Senator proposes to limit the civil rights of the negroes, to those rights specifically named. But the bill goes on—and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property.

What is property? It has been judicially decided that the elective franchise is property. Leaving out the question of voting, however, as a question of property, is it not true that under our republican form and system of government the ballot is one of the modes of securing property, one of the means by which property is secured? Your bill gives to these persons every security for the protection of person and property which a white man has. What is one means and a very important means of securing the rights of person and property? It is a voice in the Government which makes the laws regulating and governing the right of property.

Under our system of government—mark you, I do not say that it is so under all Governments—one of the strongest and most efficient means for the security of person and property is a participation in the selection of those who make the laws. It was therefore that I thought that the honorable Senator when he framed this bill meant to give to these persons the right of voting; and I should still think so, but for his personal disclaimer of any such object. One of the authorities which the Senator read decides, as I understand it, that the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which says that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," entitles a citizen of one State removing into another to a right to vote after acquiring a legal residence in such State. Was it for this reason and to secure this right to negroes that the Senator amended his bill this morning by declaring that all persons of African descent born in the United States shall be citizens of the United States?

But, Mr. President, whether the bill does give the right of voting or not, the bill is unconstitutional, because it assumes jurisdiction over subject-matters of which Congress has no jurisdiction; and what are these? Property within the States; authority over the judicial tribunals in the administration of law in the States; a denial to the States of their power of police regulation. Now that the war is over, in the language of loyal men I had almost said—but I find that the Attorney General, whom my friend from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] loves so well, says it is not over, although hostilities have ceased, and although the President, whom I presume is loyal, says it is over; but assuming that the war is over, I presume it will not be disloyal to say what I propose to say. I have no enemy of yours to fly to with arms in his hand to injure you, and therefore I may be trusted now with the utterance of an opinion upon this floor without being subject to that withering appellation "disloyal."

Sir, did you ever think to which you owed the most of the protection of life, liberty, and property, to your Federal Government or to your State government? I know—and I will not allow myself to be charged with uttering an unbecoming remark in this respect—I know the great advantage which the Federal Union has been to the people of this country and to the people of this whole country. I know that by being members of this Federal Union each State had a sure protection against the assaults of more powerful foes. I know that in the words, "the United States of America," there was not only a charm for the citizen, but there was a terror to the foes of every citizen. The Union of these States was designed to give this general protection, but never designed for the purpose of regulating the internal affairs of the States or securing to the citizen the possession of his person and property and liberty within the limits of a State. There has not been a time since the formation of the Federal Union, when if it had been peaceably dissolved it might not have been so dissolved without society scarcely receiving a shock; the laws for the regulation of property, the laws regulating the descent and transmission of property, the laws protecting the citizen in his rights of person, in his security, would have been in full force within the States, would have been administered in peace and quietness, and all the great interests of the citizens of the State would have been as securely protected, except as against foreign foes, as though that Union had existed. But there has never been a time when if the State governments had been destroyed society would not have been reduced to chaos. And yet, sir, these States thus securing to the citizen all his rights of person and property, and reserving to themselves out of the powers granted to the General Government these rights of protection to their citizens, these States which never granted or meant to grant to the Federal Government any such authority, find themselves by this bill invaded and defrauded of the right of determining who shall hold property and who shall not within its limits, who shall sue and be sued, and who shall give evidence in its courts. All these things are taken out of the control of the States by the paramount authority of this bill, if it be a constitutional bill, and the power is given to the Federal Congress to determine these things, the will of a State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. President, this bill not only proposes to assume control over the laws which shall govern title to estates, but also to determine the persons who shall be entitled to enjoy estates and property within the States, and if you can do this as to a portion of that property, any particular species of it, you can do so as to the whole: if you can regulate and govern in one particular, you can govern in reference to all the property and all the interests of the States. If you can determine who shall hold property in a State then you can enact laws for the protection of the owner in its possession. Then also you can determine who shall not hold property within a State. If you can say who shall sue or give evidence in the courts of a State then you can determine who shall not sue or give evidence in such courts. Such an assumption of power on the part of Congress ought to arouse the people of the whole country to a sense of impending danger. Let them take warning in time. But, sir, this bill positively deprives the State of its police power of government. In my State for many years, and I presume there are similar laws in most of the southern States, there has existed a law of the State based upon and founded in its police power, which declares that free negroes shall not have the possession of fire-arms or ammunition. This bill proposes to take away from the States this police power, so that if in any State of this Union at any time hereafter there shall be such a numerous body of dangerous persons belonging to any distinct race as to endanger the peace of the State, and to cause the lives of its citizens to be subject to their violence, the State shall not have the power to disarm them without disarming the whole population. Is this within your constitutional power and authority? Where did you get it? Are the utterances which come to us from the highest judicial tribunal, which sits but a few feet off, of no account here? Are not the declarations of those who assisted in framing this Constitution to be of any avail here? I suppose not, for I suppose it is a foregone conclusion that this measure, as one of a series of measures, is to be passed through this Congress regardless of all consequences. But the day that the President of the United States places his approval and signature to that Freedmen's Bureau bill and to this bill, he will have signed two acts more dangerous to the liberty of his countrymen, more disastrous to the citizens of this country, than all acts which have been passed from the foundation of the Government to this present hour; and if we upon this side of the Chamber manifest anxiety and interest in reference to these bills and the questions involved in them, it is because having known this population all our lives, knowing them in one hour of our infancy better than you gentlemen have known them all your lives, we feel compelled by a sense of duty, earnestly and importunately it may be, to appeal to the judgment of the American Senate, and to reach, if possible, the judgment of the great mass of the American people, and invoke their attention to the awful consequences involved in measures of this character. Sir, stop, stop; the mangled, bleeding body of the Constitution of your country lies in your path; you are treading upon its bleeding body when you pass these laws.

But, sir, let me call your attention for a moment to what are the powers of the States under the Federal Constitution, and what it is they do not and never did intend to surrender to the Federal Government.

The Federalist speaking on this subject says:

"The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State."

I cite that to show that in the judgment of the men who made the Constitution all these powers embraced in your bill are reserved to the States and to the States exclusively, because certainly they concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people. In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 203, the court say, speaking of the police powers of a State:

"They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government, all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State."

In the case of the City of New York vs. Miln, in 11 Wheaton, the court say:

"We choose rather to plant ourselves on what we consider impregnable positions. They are these: that a State has the same undeniable and unlimited jurisdiction over all persons and things within its territorial limits as any foreign nation, where that jurisdiction is not surrendered or restrained by the Constitution of the United States."

"That by virtue of this it is not only the right but the bounden and solemn duty of a State to advance the safety, happiness, and prosperity of its people, and to provide for its general welfare by any and every act of legislation which it may deem to be conducive to these ends where the power over the particular subject or the manner of its exercise is not surrendered or restrained in the manner just stated. That all those powers which relate merely to municipal legislation, or what may perhaps more properly be called internal police, are not thus surrendered or restrained; and that consequently in relation to these the authority of the State is complete, unqualified, and exclusive."

Again, the court in the same case say:

"We should say that every law came within this description which concerned the welfare of the whole people of a State, or any individual within it, whether it related to their rights or their duties; whether in their public or private relations; whether it related to the rights of persons or of property, of the whole people of a State or of any individual within it, and whose operation was within the territorial limits of the State, and upon the persons and things within its jurisdiction. But we will endeavor to illustrate our meaning rather by exemplification than by definition. No one will deny that a State has a right to punish any individual found within its jurisdiction who shall have committed an offense within its jurisdiction against its criminal laws."

Again:

"We suppose it to be equally clear that a State has as much right to guard by anticipation against the commission of an offense against its laws as to inflict punishment upon the offender after it shall have been committed."

I will show you hereafter that the bill under consideration attempts to deprive the States of these rights which the Supreme Court say are undoubted rights of the States.

I cite these passages for the purpose of showing that the Supreme Court of the United States has recognized all the subjects embraced in the first section of this bill as being the subjects solely of State cognizance; and unless you can show that the States have surrendered the control over them to the Federal Government, they still belong to the States, exclusively. I have, endeavored to show that you did not obtain cognizance of these subjects by the adoption of your amendment to the Constitution, and I have, as briefly as I could, attempted to show that the power over them was not surrendered by the States or granted in the Constitution before the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. President, there are other serious objections to this bill. The third section proposes to enact:

That the district courts of the United States within their respective districts, shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several States, cognizance of all crimes and offenses committed against the provisions of this act, and also, concurrently with the circuit courts of the United States, of all causes, civil and criminal, affecting persons who are denied or cannot enforce in the courts or judicial tribunals of the State or locality where they may be any of the rights secured to them by the first section of this act, and if any suit or prosecution, civil or criminal, has been or shall be commenced in any State court against any such person, or against any officer, civil or military, or other person, for any arrest or imprisonment—

Mark you, sir, the words are very comprehensive—trespasses or wrongs done or committed by virtue or under color of authority derived from this act, or the act to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, such defendant shall have the right to remove such cause for trial to the proper district or circuit court in the manner prescribed by the act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases, approved March 3, 1863.

And then it goes on to provide that after the case is so removed the circuit or district courts shall attempt to carry into effect, what? The State law, and to render its decisions conformably to the common law as modified by State law in cases where that can be done. Now, I wish to show you that this provision of the bill is flagrantly unconstitutional, even if there was nothing exceptionable in the subject-matter of its provisions. I turn to that section of the Constitution which relates to the judicial power of the Federal Government, and I read:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority."

Now, I will show you many cases which cannot arise under the Constitution of the United States, which cannot arise under the laws of the United States, which cannot arise even under this bill, which cannot arise under treaties, and yet which this bill takes from the cognizance of the State courts and attempts to give to the circuit and district courts of the United States. Notice the words:

That the district courts of the United States, within their respective districts, shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several States, cognizance of all crimes and offenses committed against the provisions of this act, and also, concurrently with the circuit courts of the United States, of all causes, civil and criminal, affecting persons who are denied or cannot enforce in the courts or judicial tribunals of the State or locality where they may be any of the rights secured to them by the first section of this act.

Suppose that an action of ejectment is instituted in any State where free negroes are denied the right to testify, and suppose that action of ejectment is against a free negro. He wishes to prove that he has not been guilty of the trespass in ejectment, and he proposes to prove it by a negro, and the court say, "No; under the law of this State that negro is not a competent witness." In such a case as that, this bill authorizes the circuit or district court of the United States to take cognizance of that action of ejectment, and the State courts are excluded from its consideration. I ask, did that cause of action, the right of A, a citizen of the State of Maryland, to sue another person in an action of ejectment, arise under the Constitution of the United States? Did it arise under any law of Congress? Did it arise under any treaty? Certainly not. These are the cases where alone the courts of the United States have jurisdiction; and yet you propose to take a case arising under neither of these from the control of the State courts and give it to the district court of the United States. On what ground? Simply because the judge, in saying what evidence should go before the jury, says that that negro cannot testify. And the district court is to have jurisdiction—

Also, concurrently with the circuit courts of the United States, of all causes, civil and criminal, affecting persons who are denied or cannot enforce in the courts or judicial tribunals of the State or locality where they may be any of the rights secured to them by the first section of this act.

Here has been one of these beloved human beings denied the privilege of testifying, or the defendant in the case denied the privilege and the right of having him as a witness; and because of that fact the State courts are ousted of their jurisdiction to try a case of ejectment. But, sir, this act will bear a further, and as I believe, a true interpretation, and it is this: if, by the laws of the State, the negro population are denied the right to testify, then any suit brought against a negro in that State shall not be heard in the State court, but shall be heard in the district or circuit court of the United States. "All causes, civil and criminal, affecting persons who are denied or cannot enforce in the courts and judicial tribunals of the State," is the language of this bill.

I have shown you a case which cannot possibly arise under the Constitution of the United States, the laws of the United States, or the treaties of the United States, where this bill does oust the State courts of their jurisdiction, or assumes to do so, and gives exclusive jurisdiction to the Federal courts. But that is not all, sir. What a beautiful spectacle it would present, and what would be the practical operations of your bill in other respects! The laws of my State do not allow a free negro to testify against a white man except where there is no white person present. A is indicted in the courts of my State for an assault upon B; B denies it; A proves it by his own testimony, he proves it by twenty white men standing around. B, of course, does not want to suffer, and at least if he has to suffer he wishes to put it off as long as possible. He will say, "Well, I will call this negro; Sambo, come up here and testify." Sambo is called. He knows nothing about the case. He was not within forty miles of the transaction. Perhaps he has been sent for to Philadelphia to come down for the purpose of getting this case into the circuit or district court of the United States. He is called, and he is produced on the stand. The judge of our State will say—we never had a judge and I hope we never shall have one that, even if your bill was passed, would know so little about law as to recognize its validity—"That black witness is excluded from testifying," even in a case that he may know something about, and thereupon that criminal case (for this bill provides for taking criminal as well as civil cases) is to be transferred to the circuit or district court of the United States. You transfer to the Federal judicial tribunals every case, both of a criminal and civil nature, that can possibly arise in a State. These things will be done for delay if nothing else, and you will find your district and circuit courts engaged in every State, from the commencement of the year to its conclusion, in trying every little petty case of a civil character in which from ten cents to thousands of dollars are involved, and you will find that the whole criminal code of a State, if the Federal courts can have the power of administering it, will be administered by the Federal courts and not the State courts.

Take another case. A free negro commits murder in the State of Kentucky. He is indicted under the laws of Kentucky in the State courts. His guilt is proved beyond a reasonable doubt by a hundred people who saw him commit the act. He calls up a negro. He may have seen him commit it, or he may not have seen him commit it. He may know something about it, or he may know nothing about it. The judge in Kentucky, I suppose—if the judges in that State are now what they used to be, men of learning, character, knowledge, dignity—would say under their law that this negro could not be a witness. What does this bill provide? It provides that that case of murder shall be taken from the jurisdiction and control of the State courts, and that the district and circuit courts of the United States shall have exclusive jurisdiction of it. Sir, there cannot be a case of chicken-stealing in any State of this Union where freed negroes are not allowed to testify that can, if this bill is to be operative and in force, be determined in the State courts. All such cases will be subject to be removed into the Federal courts. I suppose this will not be denied by any one, at least in cases where such offenses shall be committed by negroes and negro testimony in their defense shall be excluded.

If such consequences as these are to result from such enactments as this—and I honestly believe they are, if it is to be operative—what becomes of the States of this Union? What becomes of the powers of the States? What becomes of the rights of the States? Sir, they have not even the privilege of administering their criminal laws; they have not the privilege of saying who shall give evidence and who shall not in their own courts; they have not the privilege of saying who shall hold property and who shall not; and if they have none of these privileges—and I will show you that they have not before I am done—they have not the power to protect their own citizens against murder, rape, arson, any crime that can be committed against them, because what does another section of this bill provide?

That for any act done under this bill and to carry out its provisions the State courts shall not have jurisdiction, but the circuit and district courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction. Take the case put by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania where a judge on the bench holds that under the State law a negro cannot testify, or take another case: suppose that some white man has in some respect slightly infringed some of the rights which your bill proposes to give to a free negro, what then? Your bill authorizes any commissioner (and their numbers may be legion) to deputize in writing anybody to go and arrest the judge who has made that decision, because if to give evidence be a right, his action would be a denial of the right under this bill. I deny that it is a right in any man to testify in a case depending between others. It is a right in a party to a suit to call for the evidence of another person, but there is no right in that person to testify. You may call it a right to work on the roads if you please; it is generally considered a burden. The right to serve on juries may be considered a burden, but it is a duty if the State demands it. It is no right in the citizen. A party to an action has the power to call for the testimony of a witness, but it is no right on the part of the person to testify. Your bill, however, treats it as a right, and I so treat it for the sake of the argument only. The judge has made that decision, the white man has slightly infringed some of the rights which your bill proposes to guaranty to the negro. Your commissioner—and he may be as black as the ace of spades, as far as this act is concerned—may send another free negro to arrest that judge or to arrest that white man. Your negro deputized officer, acting under your negro commissioner, if he be a negro—and there is no security that he will not be, because you now propose to confer the right of suffrage on the negro, and if you confer the right of suffrage on him you must certainly, to be consistent, allow him to hold office—goes to the judge or the individual who has committed this slight trespass and says, "I come to arrest you," and the answer is, "I will not go with you," and he shoots him down, and he is indicted in the State courts for that murder.

Now, what says your bill? You say that the courts of that State shall not have jurisdiction, because it was for an act done in discharge or under color of what the negro officer claimed to be his duty under this law, and you remove the trial of the cause from the State court into the Federal court. Human ingenuity cannot escape from it; you get him there, and after you get him there what can you do with him? If there is one principle more clearly recognized than another, it is that the Federal courts will not attempt to administer the State laws, and neither will the State courts attempt to administer the Federal laws. That is to say, a Federal court will not apply to an act a punishment created under the statute of a State. It will not execute the criminal laws of a State, and you cannot confer upon it jurisdiction to do so, because its jurisdiction is defined and limited in the Constitution of the United States. Neither can a State court inflict a penalty incurred under a Federal statute. When you get the negro into the Federal court, what are you going to do with him? Why, says the bill, as far as it can be done, the court shall conform to the common law as modified by the laws of the State. I will read the language of the bill:

The jurisdiction in civil and criminal matters hereby conferred on the district and circuit courts of the United States shall be exercised and enforced in conformity with the laws of the United States, so far as such laws are suitable to carry the same into effect; but in all cases where such laws are not adapted to the object, or are deficient in the provisions necessary to furnish suitable remedies, and punish offenses against law, the common law, as modified and changed by the constitution and statutes of the State wherein the court having jurisdiction of the cause, civil or criminal, is held, so far as the same is not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, shall be extended to and govern said courts in the trial and disposition of such cause, and if of a criminal nature, in the infliction of punishment on the party found guilty.

A Federal court hearing and determining a case of ejectment between persons of the same State, brought to recover possession of land in the State in which both parties reside and awarding a writ of possession! A Federal court hearing and determining a case of larceny, the larceny being committed by a free negro, and administering the criminal law of the State! Surely

"Judgment has fled to brutish beasts
And men have lost their reason."

How you gentlemen will like the infliction of this punishment when you come to my State, and one of these pet-lambs with a black skin shall be indicted for larceny, and you deprive the State of the jurisdiction of trying it, and it is removed to the circuit court of the United States or the district court of the United States; how your Federal judge, if he be of the same opinions with you, will like to carry that law into execution! Do you know what our law does with them? It provides for whipping his bare back. We have a whipping-post in our State, and I think it is the most efficient means I ever knew for the prevention of thieving. For five years it was my duty as the law-officer of the State to prosecute in my State, and we never were troubled with those fellows from Philadelphia and Baltimore who would slip over and steal a horse or anything else after once the lash was applied to them. How the humane feelings of all New England would be shocked—even the honorable Senator opposite me would have to come before the Senate of the United States and talk of the inhumanity to one of these pets of congressional legislation because his back had been made to feel the lash. However, I will state, to relieve any premature tears, that the same punishment is meted out to the white man who commits the same act.

I have thus shown you, I think, Mr. President, that under this section of the bill the States are or may be deprived of the execution of most if not all their laws relating to the commission of crime, that the criminal jurisdiction of the courts of the States, in other words, is by the provisions of this bill ousted. I have shown you how civil causes, not arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, may, under the provisions of this bill, be carried to the circuit and district courts of the United States, when the Constitution of the United States says that in such cases where they do not so arise those courts shall not have jurisdiction. If I have made this plain I ask the Senate how they can support a bill obnoxious to such objections.

But, Mr. President, the remaining portion of this bill may be called its machinery to carry it into effect; and I will briefly call the attention of the Senate to that machinery. It seems in these late war times that the passion for arresting people became so general, wide-spread, and universal, that now that peace is restored, at least when hostilities do not exist, we are not to get rid of that feeling, but that the law of vengeance and of punishment must still be indulged in. We have so accustomed our minds to the propriety and necessity of arresting people for any and every offense, and inflicting upon them cruel and unnecessary punishment, that we cannot now in times of peace dispossess ourselves of that feeling; and the mild and amiable and learned chairman of the Judiciary Committee, it seems, cannot now agree to live one day without seeing somebody arrested and dragged before somebody else, and witnessing a heavy, unusual, and cruel punishment inflicted. What does this bill do? He is going to see that these dearly beloved subjects of congressional favor shall have daily evidence of the kind regard in which they are held by their republican friends and allies, and he is, with whip in hand, chasing every white man through every State of this Union to inflict punishment upon him if he dares invade the rights of any of the negro race.

The fourth section provides that—

The district attorneys, marshals, and deputy marshals of the United States, the commissioners appointed by the circuit and territorial courts of the United States, with power of arresting, imprisoning, or bailing offenders against the laws of the United States, the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, and every other officer who may be specially empowered by the President of the United States, are to make arrests.

He is afraid he will not get enough officers to make arrests; the commissioners will not do; and another section of this bill provides that they may be increased indefinitely. He is afraid that he will not be able by all the other machinery provided by the bill to get enough persons to arrest white transgressors of this law, and so every other officer who may be specially empowered by the President of the United States is to be empowered to make these arrests.

And they are hereby specially authorized and required, at the expense of the United States, to institute proceedings against all and every person who shall violate the provisions of this act, and cause him or them to be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States or territorial court as by this act has cognizance of the offense; and with a view to affording reasonable protection to all persons in their constitutional rights of equality before the law, without distinction of race or color, or previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, and to the prompt discharge of the duties of this act, it shall be the duty of the circuit courts of the United States and the superior courts of the Territories of the United States, from time to time, to increase the number of commissioners so as to afford a speedy and convenient means for the arrest—

The honorable Senator wants speedy and convenient modes of arresting people—and examination of persons charged with a violation of this act.

Then the sixth section provides very heavy penalties against any marshal or officer who shall disobey or refuse to perform any of the duties imposed by this act; and what is the power that it gives to these marshals? They may call in the posse comitatus or the bystanders, and they are all to be punished if they refuse to aid in making arrests. What did the honorable Senator say, and what did other honorable Senators say, when the fugitive slave law gave the power to the marshals to summon persons to make an arrest? They were horrified. What was their language? "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" And yet, sir, when it comes to a negro deputy of a negro commissioner probably arresting a white man, he shall have the posse comitatus and he shall have the bystanders to aid him. A marshal, or the ignorant deputized agent of a marshal, shall have the power to summon all the able-bodied men in any county in the United States to aid him in arresting a white man for committing the simplest offense against a negro, when you gentlemen were so awfully horrified at the idea of allowing a marshal of the United States to summon, not the posse comitatus, but to summon citizens to execute that law against fugitives from service. Verily, not only the negro is as good in law as the white man in your opinion of him, but he is much more favored and better protected. Let a white man dare to do any of these things which your bill forbids, and he is subject to heavy fines and imprisonment.

I have shown you from the provisions of the bill that it authorizes the number of the commissioners to be multiplied to any extent, that it gives the power to those commissioners of deputizing in writing whomsoever they please to make these arrests. And what does it do besides? It gives that fellow so deputized five dollars for doing his dirty work. What will be the consequence? Suppose I have not committed any offense at all against one of these beloved of Federal legislation; suppose I have done nothing, but suppose somebody goes to the commissioner and says that I have. He deputizes anybody, white or black, to arrest me, and he carries me before his supreme highness, the commissioner, and when I have gone there, there is not one word laid to my charge, the commissioner pockets his ten dollars, the man making the arrest pockets his five dollars and all other expenses. I go free. What is the power that the bill gives? The commissioner may cause to be arrested every white man in my State or any other State for the purpose of getting his ten dollars and giving the five dollars to the marshal or his deputy. It is a grand money-making business when you come to look into it. And yet, sir, when that free negro commissioner or white commissioner has appointed his deputy, either white or black, to arrest me and all the rest of the citizens of my State, if none of us have done anything transgressing even the provisions of your law and they have pocketed their fees, what can we do? We have been falsely imprisoned; even your commissioner has said we have done nothing wrong; we have been falsely imprisoned, dragged from our homes, and we go and appeal to the courts of our State for protection, and we present this fellow who has arrested us to the grand jury and they find a true bill for assault and false imprisonment. It is against one of the darlings of your heart, and therefore you will not let the State hear the cause but you remove it far from our residences and our homes into the district or circuit court of the United States!

But this is not all. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee is still fearful that his free American fellow-citizens of African descent may suffer some deprivation of right or infliction of wrong that may not be summarily and adequately redressed. He is fearfully apprehensive that there is some white man that ought to be arrested who may escape, and hence he provides in his bill that the President shall be authorized to employ the land and naval forces the more efficiently to execute its provisions. Poor fugitive white man. If you shall escape the pursuing and avenging army commanded by the Lieutenant General of the armies of the United States and attempt to cross the briny deep, the Navy, the entire Navy, shall chase you from the sea. Sir, your whole Army and Navy will be inadequate to execute this unconstitutional law, if law this bill shall become.

Sir, was I wrong in my opening remarks when I said that this was one of the most dangerous bills, as well as one of the most unconstitutional bills, that could engage the attention of the Senate of the United States. Go sweep the whole field of legislation in any country in which a legislative body has ever sat, and drag from the pigeon-holes where moulder and rot its records, and show me, if you can, any enactment so flagrantly unjust, so oppressive in its character, so violative of all rights of the citizen, as this.

Mr. President, I know that any appeal that we can make will be in vain, or at least I have no reason to suppose that any we can make will be effective for good. The passage of this bill, if it shall become a law by the approval of the President, and shall go into practical effect, is the last act to convert a Federal Government with limited and well-defined powers into an absolute, consolidated despotism.

Sir, from early boyhood I was taught to love and revere the Federal Union and those who made it. In early childhood I read the words of the Father of his Country, in which he exhorted the people to cling to the union of these States as the palladium of liberty, and my young heart bounded with joy in reading the burning words of lofty patriotism. I was taught in infancy to admire as far as the infant mind could admire our free system of government, Federal and State; and I heard the old men say that the wit of man never devised a better or more lovely system of government. When I arrived at that age when I could study and reflect for myself, the teachings of childhood were approved by the judgment of the man.

I have seen how under this Union we had become great in the eyes of all nations; and I see now, notwithstanding the horrible afflictions of war, if we can have wisdom in council and sincere purpose to subserve the good of the whole people of the United States, though much that was dear to us has been blasted as by the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noon-day, how we might in the providence of God resume our former position among the nations of the earth, and command the respect of the whole civilized world. But, sir, to-day, in viewing and in considering this bill the thought has occurred to me, how happy were the founders of our Federal system of government that they had been taken from the council chambers of this nation and from among their fellow-men before bills of this character were seriously presented for legislative consideration. Happily for them, they sleep their last sleep, and—

"How sleep the brave who sink to rest
By all their country's wishes blest!
When Spring with dewy fingers cold
Returns to deck their hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod."

"By fairy hands their knell is rung;
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall henceforth repair
And dwell a weeping hermit there."

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 29, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order the call of committees for reports, to go upon the Calendar, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The committees were called, commencing with the Committee of Elections; and no reports were presented.

PRESENTS TO OFFICE-HOLDERS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the call of States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Indiana. Under this call, the first resolution in order is one offered on last Monday by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] the morning hour having on that day expired pending the call of the previous question upon the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the conduct of his Excellency, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, in declining to accept a carriage and horses tendered to him since his accession to office by some of his friends in New York, was, under the circumstances which surrounded him, eminently prudent, commendable, and patriotic, affording, as it did, a valuable example to others similarly situated, and meets the unqualified approbation of this House.

Be it further resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the practice, now so common, of persons holding official positions under the Government accepting presents of value from their subordinates in office, more or less dependent upon them for appointment, promotion, or other official favors, is demoralizing in its tendencies, destructive of public confidence, and ought to be prohibited.

Mr. DEFREES. Mr. Speaker, cannot this matter be laid over until my colleague [Mr. NIBLACK] shall be present?

The SPEAKER. It cannot. The resolution is now before the House, and the demand for the previous question is pending.

On seconding the call for the previous question, there were, on a division—ayes 34, noes 35; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed MESSRS. KEER and PLANTS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 44.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to inquire whether a motion to lay the first of these resolutions on the table would be in order.

The SPEAKER. It would not be, because that would carry with it both resolutions.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I ask for a division of the question, so that the vote may be taken separately on the first resolution. I trust that that resolution will not be adopted, because it is evidently intended to imply a censure upon the late President.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be divided. The gentleman's motion to lay on the table would now be in order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the first resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. KERR. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 119, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Benjamin, Eckley, Farnsworth, Longyear, McIndoe, Miller, Moulton, Pomerooy, Sloan, Spalding, and Windom—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Brooks, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Deffrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James K. Hubbell, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, Mercur, Moorhead, Morrill, Newell, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, John

H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—119.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Barker, Blaine, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Culver, Davis, Denison, Driggs, Dumont, Garfield, Grinnell, Henderson, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Hulbard, James Humphrey, Jones, Kelso, Ketcham, Laffin, Marston, McCullough, McNuer, Morris, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, O'Neill, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Sawyer, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starr, Stevens, Stillwell, Strouse, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Williams, and Wright—30.

So the House refused to lay the first resolution on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. ANCONA stated that his colleague, Mr. DENISON, was detained from the House by sickness.

The result was announced as above stated.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the first resolution.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Is it in order to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not, as the previous question has been seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on the first resolution, it was adopted.

The second resolution was adopted.

Mr. KERR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. HILL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to report a rule prohibiting the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives for any other purpose than the legitimate business of Congress.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I suppose that the resolution does not exclude the Sunday service by the Chaplain.

Mr. HILL. Of course not, as that is in connection with his position in this House.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope the resolution will be amended so as to read "that the committee inquire into the expediency."

Mr. HILL. I prefer to have the resolution mandatory, and to take the sense of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the resolution prevent us from assembling here sometime next month to hear a eulogy on the late President?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot construe the resolution now.

Mr. HILL demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 61.

Mr. HILL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 78, not voting 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Higby, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James K. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longyear, McClure, McIndoe, McKee, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, O'Neill, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, John H. Rice, Rollins, Shellabarger, Stevens, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Welker, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Banks, Bergen, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Brooks, Buckland, Chanler, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deffrees, Donnelly, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Kasson, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Bland, Marshall, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Newell, Niblack, Noell, Orth, Phelps, Pomerooy, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Stillwell, Taber, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—78.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barker, Culver, Denison, Driggs, Dumont, Harris, Henderson, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Jones, Ketchum, Ladin, Loan, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McKuer, Myers, Nicholson, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sitercaes, Starr, Strouse, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, and Wright—31.

So the resolution was not laid upon the table. The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 63, noes 62.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HILL and TAYLOR were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 62.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Mr. JULIAN submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, As the deliberate judgment of this House, that the speedy trial of Jefferson Davis for the crime of treason, and his prompt execution when found guilty, are imperatively demanded by the people of the United States, in order that treason may be adequately branded by the nation, traitors made infamous, and the repetition of their crime, as far as possible, be prevented.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suggest that the word "when" be stricken out and "if" inserted, so as to read, "if found guilty," &c., and insert the words "either by a civil or military tribunal."

Mr. JULIAN. I accept that as a modification of my resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I think he had better be tried by town meeting. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana to let this resolution go over, for the reason that if it is confined to the mere crime of treason everybody knows that a military tribunal has no cognizance at all. There are other crimes with which this man stands charged, which are cognizable only within the States in military tribunals of justice. Therefore I trust the gentleman will not press this thing to a vote in this way without giving the House an opportunity, at least, to amend the resolution.

Mr. JULIAN. I mean to insist on the previous question.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend by striking out the word "deliberate," if it is in order.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order, the previous question being moved.

Mr. BINGHAM. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana, if this resolution must be pressed to a vote, that he insert after the word "treason" the words "or other crimes with which he stands charged."

Several MEMBERS. Yes, yes.

Mr. JULIAN. I agree to that.

A MEMBER. What are they?

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to ask the gentleman—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, except by unanimous consent, the previous question being moved.

Mr. STEVENS. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana to send this resolution to the Judiciary Committee, as there are resolutions of this kind now before them.

The previous question was not seconded, the ayes being twenty-six, noes not counted.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It then goes over under the rule.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FARQUHAR submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to report an amendment to the election laws of the District of Columbia, excluding from the privilege of suffrage within said District all persons who have voluntarily borne arms against the United States or accepted office from the rebels during the late rebellion.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

PENSIONS TO TEAMSTERS' WIDOWS, ETC.

Mr. ORTH submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of granting pensions to the widows and heirs of teamsters and hospital stewards who may have died while in the service during the late rebellion.

Mr. UPSON. I suggest to the gentleman to include "wagoners," by inserting that word after "teamsters."

Mr. ORTH. I accept the modification.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution as modified was adopted.

PRIVILEGED QUESTION.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I was detained this morning in one of the Departments longer than I anticipated, and therefore my vote on the resolution offered last Monday by me is not recorded. Of course I would have voted for it. I did not anticipate that it would be called up so soon this morning.

CIRCULATING NOTES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement prepared by the Comptroller of the Currency of the apportionment of the circulating notes made to the different banking associations in the various States, in reply to a resolution of the House of January 19, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF REVENUE LAWS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 29, 1866.

SIR: Herewith I have the honor to present to you a report from Messrs. David A. Wells, Stephen Colwell, and S. S. Hayes, appointed a commission for the revision of the revenue system of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of the nineteenth section of the amendatory act of Congress, approved March 2, 1865.

In presenting this report it may be proper for me to remark that, with the single exception, perhaps, of the one in regard to the time at which the payment of the principal of the national debt should be commenced, the recommendations of the commission have my hearty approval. The very important work devolved upon the commission, as far as it has been presented, has been most admirably performed. I earnestly ask that the report may receive the early and careful consideration of Congress.

I am, very truly, your obedient servant,
HUGH McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, the communication was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to add to his motion that the Committee on Printing inquire into the expediency of printing an extra number of copies of that document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move for the printing of extra copies, and the motion will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move that the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of printing ten thousand extra copies of the report.

The motion was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be authorized to employ a clerk, at the usual rate of compensation, for not exceeding forty days during the present session.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INCOME TAX.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform this House whether the income taxes levied and collected from the estates of deceased persons whose deaths occurred subsequently to December 31, 1863, and prior to the levy for that year, are treated by the Treasury Department as lawful collections, while in similar cases for subsequent years such taxes are not collected, or, if collected, are refunded, and if such be the practice of the Department, what authority of law there is for such discrimination.

COURTS IN REBEL STATES.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill securing to non-resident litigants the benefit of the jurisdiction of the United States courts in States lately in rebellion in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the House of Representatives the various reports most recently made from officers of the Engineer corps, of repairs, alterations, and improvements required at different harbors on the sea, on the lake coasts, and inland rivers, where public works are built, or ordered, or are in the course of erection, and to give such information as to the appropriations required for the next fiscal year for the advantageous prosecution of the work, which may be in the possession of the Department.

SESSIONS OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee of Ways and Means have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

There was no objection; and the leave was granted.

UNITED STATES LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. ECKLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the United States Life Insurance Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

ARSENAL EXPLOSION.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee for the District of Columbia, for action at this time, a joint resolution for the relief of the sufferers by the late explosion at the United States arsenal in this city.

The joint resolution was read. It appropriates $2,500 to be placed by the Secretary of the Treasury in the hands of Colonel Benton, the commandant of the arsenal, to be distributed among the sufferers by the recent explosion according to the equities and necessities of their several cases, and that said commandant report the details of said distribution to Congress with the vouchers therefor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This is one of a great many cases. There have been explosions at City Point and at other places, and I think we had better have a general law. I therefore object to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGER BILL.

Mr. DARLING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. STEVENS called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the consideration of the following joint resolution reported by the joint committee on reconstruction:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE — Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. LE BLOND to refer the joint resolution and pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon which Mr. RAYMOND was entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. With the permission of my colleague, [Mr. RAYMOND,] I will request the Chair to state the exact position of this subject before the House, and the various questions now pending.

The SPEAKER. The committee having reported this joint resolution, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] moved to amend by inserting the word "therein" after the words "all persons," in the last clause of the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

Pending that motion, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] moved an entirely new proposition in the nature of a substitute for the joint resolution reported from the joint committee, proposing an amendment to the Constitution differing from the one reported from the committee. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAKER,] also submitted for his colleague [Mr. INGERSOLL,] a proposition in the nature of a substitute for the one reported from the committee, as an amendment to the amendment.

Pending those two propositions, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] moved to recommit the joint resolution to the joint committee with certain instructions. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] moved to amend the instructions, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] moved to amend the amendment.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] also moved to commit the whole subject to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The first question will therefore be upon the motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole, as that committee is higher in rank than the joint committee on reconstruction.

Next after that will be the various motions to recommit with instructions. If all those propositions should fail, then the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] being for the purpose of perfecting the original proposition, will come up for consideration. Then the propositions in the nature of substitutes will come up for consideration; first the amendment to the amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAKER,] and next the substitute amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

RECEPTION OF GENERAL SHERMAN.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I appeal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] to give way to enable me to make a motion that the House take a recess of five minutes, and that in the mean time the Speaker invite the distinguished general now on the floor, Major General W. T. Sherman, to the chair, and introduce him to the members of this House.

Mr. RAYMOND. I yield with pleasure. The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly took a recess.

[The SPEAKER having conducted General Sherman to the Speaker's desk, said:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I have the honor to introduce to you this day, by your unanimous order, Major General Sherman, so well known to you and to the whole civilized world as one of our most gallant and heroic defenders in the contest for the Union which has so happily closed. Of the brilliancy of his achievements, of his services for his country in peril, but, thank God, preserved, it is needless that I should speak. I know that gratitude for those services is felt in every loyal heart. [Applause.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for three cheers for the distinguished soldier who is now present with us.

In response to this call, the members on the floor joined with the spectators in the galleries in a round of most enthusiastic applause which did not subside for some minutes.

General Sherman, when silence had been comparatively restored, said:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I am more accustomed to cheering, such as you have given me, than I am to pitching my voice to reach the confines of such a Hall as this, which I have never before entered save as a looker-on in the galleries. I can simply thank you from my heart for the cordial reception which you have extended to me, trusting that I may continue to deserve the good wishes which the warmth of your welcome has manifested. To that end I will endeavor to do all in my power. [Renewed applause.]

General Sherman then came upon the floor, and was introduced by the Speaker to the members of the House.

At the expiration of the recess the House resumed business.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. W. J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House bill No. 53, authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of a portion of the military reserve on the St. Clair river, in the State of Michigan.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 88) to restrict the expenses of collecting soldiers' claims against the Government; in which he was directed to request the concurrence of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION—AGAIN.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution now under consideration, as I understand it, comes to us for our action from the joint committee appointed, at the opening of this session, for the purpose of "inquiring into the political condition of the States lately in rebellion, in order to determine whether those States are or are not entitled to representation in Congress." How much of "information" on that subject this resolution embodies the members of this House can judge as well as I can. What precise and particular connection it has with the object for which that committee was appointed is left wholly and entirely to inference.

That committee has reported, without reasons assigned, without explanation of any sort, a naked proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States. Now, sir, I am afraid that I shall fall under the censure expressed a day or two ago by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] in regard to those who are unwilling to tamper with the Constitution of the United States as it stands to-day. I acknowledge freely that I do look upon all propositions for its amendment with hesitation and distrust. I think if there is anything established in the history of this country it is that that Constitution is the most wonderful instrument ever framed by the hand of man for the government of a great nation. I think it has proved itself fully adequate to all the emergencies of peace and of war, and I think the history of this country during the last four or five years, when the great civil contest for the destruction or preservation of this Government was carried on to a triumphant close by virtue of the provisions or under the explicit permissions of that Constitution, affords the highest possible testimony that any of us could ask to the fact of its perfect adaptation to the wants and necessities of the country.

I think, especially, that in its distribution of the powers among the different departments of the Government, that Constitution has proved its wisdom, and I think this is even still more clearly shown in its distribution of powers between the General Government and the several States. That document has proved that it was made not for days or for years, but for all time; and when I foresee the vast extent of country over which this Government may at some future time be extended, I cannot but dread any change that shall touch any of its fundamental provisions, or any of the fundamental principles upon which it rests.

Still, sir, I recognize the justice and propriety of what was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] as to the wisdom and necessity of amendments to meet changed circumstances and an altered condition of facts. I recognize, for example, in the fact that slavery has ceased to exist in this country, the propriety of so amending the Constitution as to make it forever impossible to reestablish slavery within the United States. The specific evil which the amendment reported by the committee is intended to remedy is also probably one which may properly demand attention. By the present Constitution, and under the state of things which prevailed but a year or two ago, the States in which slavery existed were entitled to the representation, in common with all the other States of the Union, of the whole number of free persons, together with three fifths of all other persons. The fact that they had among them four million persons who were not free gave them thus a great advantage in representation over all other sections of the Union. They had a representation for three fifths of those slaves. Those slaves have now been set free, and, as free persons, the States in which they are found are entitled, under the present provisions of the Constitution, to full representation for them. The South has thus gained, as a direct consequence of the rebellion, an additional representation for two fifths of those four millions. In other words, one million six hundred thousand persons are added to their representative population.

Now, sir, I acknowledge that to be an inequality which demands attention and a remedy, if a remedy can be found which shall not be worse than the evil itself. This committee has reported this amendment as providing that remedy. I do not suppose that it will be possible to propose any remedy which will not be open to some objections. I think, however, that this amendment is open to some of a very serious nature. One objection (which, however, applies equally to all the propositions that have been suggested) is that it changes the basis of representation from population to something else, and something less. It is, sir, a fundamental principle of free government, that the population, the inhabitants, all who are subjects of law, shall be represented in the enactment of that law and in the election of men by whom the law is to be executed, either directly by their own votes, or through the votes of others so connected with them as to afford a fair presumption that their wishes, their rights, and their interests will be consulted. This proposition departs from that principle, and is thus objectionable as a disturbance of the corner-stone on which our system of republican government—indeed all democratic institutions are supposed to rest.

Another objection is that the amendment as drawn by the committee is open to very considerable doubt as to the meaning of the words "race" and "color." Those grounds of doubt were ably and forcibly stated a few days since by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] and need not now be repeated. They are entitled, however, to serious and careful consideration.

Another objection is that it deprives of representation the whole of any race in a State if that State should extend to a portion of that race the elective franchise. I do not think, sir, that this is in itself a wise or just provision. It introduces the anomaly of having voters for representatives who may not be themselves entitled to representation. But when I recur to the effect of that provision upon the southern States, so clearly and forcibly pointed out the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that it holds out to those States no encouragement to enfranchise any portion of the colored race within their borders unless they make suffrage with that race universal, I cannot help feeling that its effect would be most disastrous upon the relations of this Union to the whole southern States, and upon the welfare of those States themselves, and of the colored people within their borders.

But, sir, I do not intend to pursue this inquiry into the merits of the resolution, still less into the merits of the various amendments which have been proposed to its provisions. I cannot, in the present state of this question, regard this as a distinct proposition, standing on its merits alone. I cannot forget that it comes to us from a committee appointed for a specific object, to consider a specific subject—to report to us the political condition of the southern States with a view to their representation upon this floor. From the presumption of the case, I think I have the right to assume that this resolution relates to that general subject and is closely connected with it. I infer, moreover, from the general tone of the debate in this House on that point that this is the view taken of it all through the House; and when I regard more directly the remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] himself a member of the committee, as to its meaning and scope, I am not only confirmed in my belief that it does relate to that general subject, but I confess I am startled as to the scope of action that it proposes to embrace, of which this is to be the initial step. The gentleman from Ohio told us the other day, in very impressive and forcible language, that this was only the first of a series of amendments and propositions which that committee would submit for the action of the House. He regarded them all as essential to the safety of the country. He said he trembled when he thought that this whole series of propositions, which he deemed so important to the public welfare, might not be adopted by this Congress and the country at large.

Mr. BINGHAM. My statement was this: I tremble for my country if the proposition now pending be all that this House proposes to send to the people for their approval.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in regard to interruptions, that I shall yield cheerfully for a correction of any error into which I may fall in repeating the remarks of any gentleman; I shall cheerfully yield to any correction of any statement of fact; and I will also yield for an explanation of any point I may not make clear. Beyond this I should greatly prefer to follow the line of my remarks without interruption.

I do not understand the gentleman to make any important correction of the sentiment I understood him to express. I will adopt his explanation. He now says he trembles for his country if this were the only proposition the House should adopt. The point I wish to make is this: if this is the first of a series of propositions for amending the Constitution of the United States, so vital to the welfare of the country, which we are to assume from his remarks may be reported from that committee, we are fairly entitled to know the whole programme before we act upon any specific feature of it. How do we know what proposition will follow, if we adopt this and send it to the country? We should know the relation of this to those which are to come after it. We should know whether this is in execution of its own terms, or whether other propositions are to follow to give it effect. We should know whether the powers of the General Government of the United States are to be so enlarged as to destroy the rights which those States now hold under the Constitution of the United States. For one, sir, I am not willing in any respect to act on this or any other similar proposition from that committee, until I know what is the rest of the schedule to be presented for our adoption.

Now, sir, I cannot help believing—it is an inference merely—that this proposition is reported from that committee as part of a scheme for reconstructing the Government and the Constitution of the United States—for reconstructing both on the basis of a distinct principle which has been over and over again announced in this House. That principle is simply this: that by the war which has been raging, and as a consequence of that war, the States which were in rebellion have ceased to have any existence as States; that they have ceased to be States of this Union; that they exist only as so much waste, unorganized, ungoverned territory; that the people who live upon that territory are simply “vanquished enemies,” to be governed and disposed of by us at our sovereign will, and subject to no law but our own discretion. It is on that principle, sir, that the action proposed at this time is to be based, if it has any basis at all. That has been the tone of the debates on the subject here. That was the tone and tenor of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] who replied to some remarks which I made upon this subject a few weeks ago.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. If the gentleman is willing to yield for the purpose of correction I will say he inaccurately understands what was my meaning.

Mr. RAYMOND. Well, perhaps it would be more accurate and proper if I use the gentleman's own language. He says:

“What is before this Congress—by far the most momentous constitutional question ever here considered.—I at once condense and affirm in a single sentence.—It is under our Constitution, on possible, and the late rebellion did in fact so, overthrow and usurp in the insurrectionary States the loyal State governments as that, during such usurpation, such States and their people ceased to have any of the rights or powers of government as States of this Union; and this loss of the rights and powers of government was such that the United States may and ought to assume and exercise local powers of the lost State governments, and may control the readmission of such States to their powers of government in this Union, subject to and in accordance with the obligation to ‘guaranty to each State a republican form of government.’”

I accept that as the gentleman's statement of the case. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DEMING] stated in so many words that the people of these lately rebellious States were now “vanquished enemies,” to be dealt with politically as such, and that their lives, property, and political rights were at our absolute and sovereign disposal. And he took some credit to himself for being willing to waive in their behalf something of the strictissimum jus which the rule of subjugation would give us.

Now, sir, as I have already indicated, my position is the exact opposite of this. I deny in toto the fact of such subjugation. I do not believe that the war has given us any such power. On the contrary, I hold that these States have never ceased to be States, and have never ceased to be States in and States of the Union. And they are to-day States of the Union, and therefore entitled to all the rights conferred upon them as such by the Constitution. And we have no right and no power to exercise any authority over them which the Constitution does not confer upon us, any more than we have over the States of New England or the West.

Now, sir, I wish to say in the first place that this is sometimes spoken of as a question of mere metaphysics, or as a verbal difference, not entitled to any particular consideration in dealing with the practical relations of the subject. If I so regarded it I would not waste time in this House in its discussion. But when I see that on that distinction turns a system of policy to be pursued toward those States in restoring peace and harmony to the Union I cannot so regard it. And many of the gentlemen who themselves thus designate it have based upon that distinction, nevertheless, the whole scope of policy which they think should be pursued toward those States. I trust, therefore, that the House will forbear with me if I enter somewhat at length into an examination of the great principle upon which it is proposed that this question should rest. I can do it, perhaps, more clearly and satisfactorily than otherwise, in the form of reply to objections which have been urged against the position I have taken; and, without disrespect to any other gentlemen on this floor, I shall take the speech made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] in reply to me as embodying the most compact, forcible, and most carefully prepared legal argument that has yet been made.

The gentleman from Ohio took the ground that habitual obedience to law must characterize a community in order to entitle it to be considered a State.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I do not wish to interrupt the line of the gentleman's argument, but I would ask to put a question now which bears directly on the point upon which he now proposes to base his argument.

Mr. RAYMOND. If the gentleman will ask his question I will tell him whether it will interrupt my argument or not.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I understood the gentleman from New York to have just said that he regards these rebel States as now in the Union to all intents and purposes as effectually and as thoroughly as any of the States of this Union. Now, then, if that is so, I wish to ask him how this happens to be true, namely, (I read from the gentleman's speech recently made on this floor:)

“The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] who preceded me took the ground that they had only to resume their places and their powers in the national Government—that their Representatives have only to come into this Hall and take their seats without question and without conditions of any sort. I cannot concur, sir, in this view. I do not think these States have any such rights. On the contrary, I think we have a full and perfect right to require certain conditions, in the nature of guarantees for the future, and that right rests, primarily and technically, on the surrender we may and must require at their hands. The rebellion has been defeated. A defeat always implies a surrender, and in a political sense a surrender implies more than the transfer of the arms used on the field of battle.”

Mr. RAYMOND. I submit to the gentleman that what he has just read is not only not a question, nor a correction, but in the nature of a reply to my argument, and as such not warranted at this point on the score of parliamentary propriety or of personal courtesy. I have no objection at the proper time to answer the question, and I probably shall do so in the course of my remarks. And I beg to suggest to him or any other gentleman on this floor that they will restrain their impatience to reply to me until I get through, or take some other time and opportunity to discuss the question than that which belongs to me.

The last clause of the passage from my remarks which the gentleman from Ohio read furnishes a clue to the whole of them. As I said then, I believe we had a right to demand of the defeated rebels whatever might properly be embraced in the terms of a surrender. That surrender, embracing not only their arms and munitions of war but the principles on which the rebellion rested, they have made and we have accepted; and now they are entitled, with certain limitations, which I shall hereafter explain, if I am allowed to proceed in the regular course of my remarks, to the rights given to them by the Constitution, and we are particularly restrained by the Constitution, which is binding on us, from doing anything toward those States which we may not properly do toward any other State within the Union.

Now, sir, I return to the argument of the gentleman in regard to the extinction of States. He takes the ground, as I was saying, that habitual obedience to law is essential to the existence of a State in the view of public law, and he quoted Wheaton and Grotius and Burlamaqui and others to sustain that position. I have no disposition to quarrel with him on that point. I admit it. I do not think it an adequate definition of a State, but as far as it goes it is just. Habitual obedience to law is essential to a State. He takes the same ground in regard to a State in the Union, that a State to be such in this Union must be characterized by habitual obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that when this habitual obedience ceases then the State ceases to be a State of the Union. I admit that also.

Now, in regard to the first proposition, as to the continued existence of a State, I have to draw his attention to one point which he overlooked. It is not simply the fact that habitual obedience to law is essential to the existence of a State, upon which he lays stress, but he assumes that this habitual obedience must be uninterrupted, that it must never be interrupted or suspended; for if it is suspended or interrupted, the course of his argument requires him to hold that the existence of the State is ended.

He quoted from Wheaton to sustain the point he made, and he quoted correctly as far as he went; but like an adroit and skillful advocate, he stopped the quotation just where it ceased to be of service to him. If he will excuse me, I will complete it. After laying down that principle, that habitual obedience to law must characterize a State, Wheaton proceeds to say:

"But whatever be its internal constitution or form of government, or whoever may be its rulers, or even if it be distracted with anarchy, through a violent contest for the Government between different parties among the people, the State still subsists in contemplation of law, until its sovereignty is completely extinguished by the final dissolution of the social tie, or by some other cause which puts an end to the being of the State."

The interruption of habitual obedience to law, then, does not extinguish the State. The State, says Wheaton, "still subsists in the contemplation of law." We have seen examples all over the world, from the earliest date of national existence to the present time, where habitual obedience to law was suspended by a variety of causes—sometimes by anarchy, sometimes by usurpation, sometimes by civil war. All through the great contest of the French Revolution habitual obedience to law was suspended. Some English publicists—Burke, I believe, among them—contended that the social ties were actually dissolved, and that France had ceased to be a State; but she never was so regarded by England or by the coalition which attempted to restore order and the Bourbons to France. What does the gentleman say in regard to the Mexican empire to-day? There has been usurpation there; there habitual obedience to law has been suspended, and what we regard as the rightful Government of that State is a fugitive among the mountains. Does the gentleman contend that the State has ceased to exist, and that when Juarez comes back to take possession of the Government of Mexico he will find no State there—that it has perished because of the suspension of obedience to its rightful law? And yet Maximilian holds its capital, its archives, and its laws. The sovereignty resides in him and in the French army which is at his back to-day.

The gentleman applies the same principle to the continued existence of States as States within this Union. He holds, and holds correctly, that they must be characterized by an habitual obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States. But, sir, that obedience may be suspended. I will read from the speech of the gentleman from Ohio his own language upon this point, lest I should misrepresent his views. He said:

"No one who can read the Constitution will deny that each State in this Union must have every one of these properties [implied in habitual obedience to the Constitution and laws] before it can commence to exist in the Union; because the Constitution so declares. Now the question I consider is, whether it shall continue to be a State, in the sense that it holds the powers and rights of a State, after it has lost every property which it must have before it could commence to exist in the Union."

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I do not propose to interrupt my friend from New York, except when he misapprehends the argument to which he is replying. He now misapprehends my proposition. Those qualities to which I allude as those that must be possessed by a State, in the clause that he has read from my speech, are not those qualities that belong to an international State, but the qualities which, by our Constitution, must inhere in a State as indicated by the reading of the Constitution itself.

Mr. RAYMOND. I appreciate that distinction, but it does not in the least affect the argument. The gentleman holds that by public law habitual obedience to law must characterize a State; and I have shown that this obedience may be suspended and still the State exist. He now holds that habitual obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States is essential to the existence of a State as within the Union, and I propose to show that in this case also that obedience may be suspended without affecting the existence of the State as a State of the Union. The analogy between the two, and between the arguments in both cases, is complete. The same principle which applies to the one applies to the other also. The gentleman asks the question which I have read from his speech. I now give him the answer by Wheaton himself from the page next to that from which the gentleman quoted. That distinguished author says:

"The habitual obedience of the members of any political society to a superior authority must have once existed in order to constitute a sovereign State. But the temporary suspension of that obedience and of that authority, in consequence of a civil war, does not necessarily extinguish the being of a State, although it may affect for a time its ordinary relations with other States."

I think that reply, made by Wheaton, and not by me, is exactly pertinent to the question as submitted by the gentleman from Ohio. It seems, therefore, on grounds of public law and on grounds of constitutional law in the United States, that habitual obedience to law may be suspended without impairing the existence of the State in the sense of public law, or as a State of the Union under the Constitution of the United States. This suspension may occur from a variety of causes. Conquest is one of them. Suppose that in a war with England, that Power should take possession of the State of Massachusetts; suppose she should plant her armed force all around her borders, take possession of her capital, and wield for a time the whole sovereign power of the State. Suppose she does that for six months, would Massachusetts thereby cease to be a State of the Union? Suppose that this occupation should be prolonged for a year, would Massachusetts then cease to be a State of this Union? Suppose that occupation should continue for two years, or three years, or four years. Whenever that usurping Power should be expelled from the State of Massachusetts, be it sooner or later, would she not then stand in her old place as one of the States of this Union? And would any action of Congress be required to restore her to it?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him at this point?

Mr. RAYMOND. I appeal to the gentleman's sense of courtesy not to interrupt me unless I am led into some misstatement of fact.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The gentleman misapprehends entirely the proposition I made. I am very anxious that he shall answer what I did say, and not reply to something I did not say. I understood the gentleman to say that he was willing to be interrupted for the purpose of correction.

Mr. RAYMOND. I submit, sir.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I thank the gentleman for this opportunity. Now, I am equally desirous with the gentleman to attain to truth in this regard. Now, I cited the law of nations for the purpose of establishing this proposition: that that community which had become lawless was, during the continuance of the lawlessness, no longer a member of the family of nations, and the authority read by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] which he says I omitted like an adroit lawyer to read, is in exact harmony with that idea, that the suspension of the character of a State continues during the period of lawlessness. That was all the point and purpose of my argument. There and at that point they ceased to be States for the time being. I afterward came to consider the question whether under our system those States that ceased to be States, even in the international sense, can be revived into governing States without the leave of my Government.

Let the gentleman answer what I say, and not what I do not say. What I said was that these States having been suspended in their rights and governments, the resumption of those rights cannot be made by their own volition, but that is a matter which is under the control of the political department of my Government, to wit, Congress and the Executive. There the analogy between the States of this Union and international States fails. An international State has no superior; and when lawlessness ceases in such a State it does revive and become a State, just as Wheaton says. But under this Government the resumption of powers by a State in this Union is subject to the high control of the Government of the United States. Let the gentleman answer that.

Mr. RAYMOND. I thank the gentleman for his permission for me to answer "that." If I understand him now—and I am surprised that I have so much difficulty in understanding him, for he is very clear in his statements as far as language goes, if not in his ideas—I understand him to say that inasmuch as these States formerly in rebellion ceased, under international law, to be States at all, they cannot be or become States in this Union without the direct consent of Congress under the Constitution of the United States. That I believe to be a correct statement of the matter, just as he has made it now.

Now, sir, I take issue with the gentleman on the question of fact. Those States did not cease to be States in the sense of international law. There never was a time when they had not government and law and obedience to law within their own borders. It does not require obedience to any particular form of law to constitute a State in the sense of public law. The government may be a monarchy to-day, a republic to-morrow, a military despotism the day after; but if there is law there the State continues to be a State. There was law and plenty of it—a great deal too much of it such as it was—in the Southern States during the whole rebellion. Why, sir, does the gentleman suppose that there was ever an hour when England, France, or any other country in the world would not have recognized each one of those rebel States as a State in the sense of public law, if they had been at liberty to do so under the explicit and peremptory prohibitions of the Government of the United States, and if they could have done so without rupturing instantly their friendly relations with that Government? No, sir, they never ceased to be States in the meaning of public law. The analogy which I drew in the case of France is perfect and complete, except that the case supposed is much stronger than that of these southern States. They were States in the sense of public international law. They were States within the contemplation of the Constitution of the United States, because the habitual obedience which was due to the Government of the United States was only suspended, not abrogated or destroyed. If they had succeeded in refusing that obedience permanently and forever, then they would have ceased to be States, not otherwise.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER?]

Mr. RAYMOND. No, sir. I prefer that no new champion should take part in this debate. I am likely to have all I can do to take care of those already involved.

Now, sir, let me recur to the analogy presented by a case of conquest. Suppose that France or England should conquer one of the States of this Union in time of war, and should hold that State for a time; would not that be such a temporary suspension of obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States as would not affect the existence of the State, either in the sense of public law or in the contemplation of the Constitution of the United States? Why, sir, I point gentlemen to a case which may have a bearing on this question, and which I believe has already been cited, though not upon this floor. During our war of 1812, the British took possession of one third of the territory of the State of Maine, including the town and port of Castine, and held it for a year—held it so completely, so absolutely, that the people within those limits were held by the Supreme Court of the United States to have been absolved for the time from their allegiance to the Government of the United States. But was that State or any part of it extinguished or Congress called on to restore it to the Union when that usurpation had been withdrawn? No, sir. The State resumed its functions. The action of Congress was not invoked at all. The State went on as a State, and as a State of the Union, just as though the usurpation had never existed; and it was left for the judicial tribunals of the country to decide how far the relations of the individuals in that district to the United States were changed or affected by the temporary suppression of their habitual obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Sir, I have supposed a case of usurpation by a foreign Power. Let me now suppose a case of usurpation by internal commotion—by the action of internal causes. For Madison, in the Federalist, says that the provisions of the Constitution in regard to the guarantee of a republican form of government, apply to usurpations of an oligarchy within a State, as well as to usurpations of another sort. Now, sir, suppose that a party or a military leader—if it were possible that any military leader in this land could contemplate such a thing—suppose that any party or any force should usurp the government of Massachusetts or of New York, and the United States should fail to redeem its pledge to guaranty to that State a republican form of government and to expel the usurping power. If it should fail permanently, then the State would be taken by force of arms out of the Union; but suppose that it should fail to do so for a year, or for two years, or for three years, still continuing the endeavor and the strife, would that failure destroy the existence of the State as a State of the Union? Certainly not. The very supposition affords its own answer. If the usurping power should hold permanent possession, then I concede that the State would cease to be a State of the Union, but not otherwise.

Now, I maintain that this is precisely what did happen in the rebel States. During the winter of 1860-61, a conspiracy against the Government of the United States existed here in this city, in this House, on this floor, aided by agents and conspirators in other sections of the country. They deliberately plotted the usurpation of the governments of the southern States, and a usurpation of the functions of the Federal Government within those States. They did all that within the knowledge and under the observation of our Government, which knew its plans and what it was proposing to do. It was the duty of our Government at that time to take due precautions against such usurpation. The distinguished chief then at the head of the Army of the United States (General Scott) recommended to the President of the United States that troops should be stationed at certain points within the proposed scene of operations, for the purpose of preventing the success of such attempted usurpation. That clearly was the duty of the Government, but the Government failed to perform its duty. The President of the United States had a theory which prevented him from interfering; and the Congress of that day refused to give him any power to interfere if he had been so disposed. It was thus, to a great extent the fault of the Government of the United States that this usurpation, which was concocted here, was carried into partial and temporary execution there. Who does not believe that, if we had had a reasonable force in the State of North Carolina, that State would never have fallen into the hands of the traitors who for a time usurped its government?

The same thing may be said of almost every southern State. We all know if the United States had performed to the letter its solemn promise to guaranty to every State a republican form of government, we should have prevented the rebellion or greatly curtailed its dimensions. But we did not perform that duty. We allowed the conspiracy to ripen and gather strength. The rebels took possession of the southern States; and we were compelled, having failed to prevent it, to raise forces for their expulsion. What was the object of all our array of force except to expel the usurpers who had taken possession of every one of the southern States? What else but that were we trying to do from the beginning to the end of the struggle?

Now, sir, if an attempted usurpation does not necessarily of itself take a State out of the Union unless it proves a success, it makes no difference at all that these usurpers are able by their force, by their control of the States within their power, to bring a majority of the people over to their side. Through our failure to protect them, the people of those States were brought under the power of the usurpers and compelled to obey their authority and aid their cause. They were in the same condition that the people of Mexico are to-day under Maximilian. They had no choice in the matter. If they refused to acquiesce, their property was confiscated and they were arraigned and compelled by force of the prevailing law to join the usurping power. We waged war for four years to expel these usurpers and deliver the people from their control. Suppose we had accomplished this at the end of six months, would any one have then contended, or would any one now contend, that any one of these States was out of the Union? Suppose we had effected this result at the end of one or of two years, should we have regarded them as thus and then out of the Union? I would like the gentleman from Ohio, or any one else, at the proper time, to point out to me the precise point of time when a State gets out of the Union by the usurpation of its powers, other than the period of its final and full success.

The gentleman from Ohio attributed to me the idea, or he assumed by his argument without saying in words that I had propounded it, that, inasmuch as these States were not at any time out of the Union, they were entitled while rebel States to all the rights of constitutional States, throughout the war; and he drew a striking picture of the terrible condition in which we should have been placed if we had allowed rebel Representatives from those rebel States to take seats upon this floor during the war. I should feel some little personal humiliation if I believed that the gentleman thought so meanly of my capacity as to suppose for one moment I could have contemplated such a thing. I do hold the theory, with certain limitations not pertinent to this discussion, that once a State always a State, and at all times a State; but to be entitled to representation or power here it must be a constitutional State, owing allegiance to the Constitution and yielding obedience to the laws of the United States. In every one of those States, if there had been a constitutional government, that government would have been entitled to recognition and representation here. Those States which had such governments were so recognized and so represented here all through the war; and you had here upon this floor, admitted by your own votes, by the votes of many who sit here now, delegates from the States of the South, and States that were in rebellion. There were delegates from Louisiana, Arkansas, from Virginia, and from both Tennessee and Kentucky at the very time the rebels held armed possession of the capitals of both those States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] also attributed to me the same thing, and he made himself facetious over it, as he had the capacity and the right to do if he saw or fancied anything facetious in it. And not content with being facetious he became sarcastic and severe. And he reached the climax of sarcasm and severity when he referred to the coincidence between my opinions on this point and those of the Democratic gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.] Well, sir, I have learned long ago that it is much better to be right with a political opponent than wrong with a professed political friend. Party names are of little consequence, especially now when they mean so little and conceal so much. And much as it may shock the gentleman, I do not hesitate to say that I would far rather be right with the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] Democrat as he is, than to be wrong even in such distinguished company as the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself [Mr. BROOMALL] Union man as he pretends to be.

The gentleman, moreover, seems to have forgotten what also escaped the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLBARGER,] that before any man can take a seat on this floor, or assume any office under the Federal Government, he must take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and must take it truly and live up to it, or bear the pains and penalties of perjury. Does he suppose for one moment that the rebel powers in those States would have sent men here who would take that oath? They themselves did not take it. They discarded it, they rejected it. And if rebel Representatives, representing rebel States, had come here they would be liable to arrest, trial, and punishment for treason. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] intimated that I had been lately converted to the doctrine of the other side on this subject, and was pleased to express a real or affect surprise thereat. Even if this had been so, I should see no reason to regret it. I trust I shall never be ashamed to change my opinions on any subject, if I can get nearer the truth thereby. I have no right to assume or expect that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be so far familiar with my political opinions, or the history of my public action, as to know the date of anything connected with either. But then he should not assume to know, on this subject or any other, more than he does know; and to prevent a repetition of his mistake on this point, if he will allow me to send him a speech made by me in Wilmington, Delaware, in the fall of 1863, more than two years ago and during the war, he will find that I held exactly the same ground then that I hold now upon this precise subject, and that I stated it in very nearly the same terms.

Now, sir, I come to another point in the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLBARGER.] I took the liberty of saying that if these States had gone out of the Union they must have gone at some particular time and in consequence of some specific act; and I asked for a definite statement of the specific time at which, and the specific act by which, this result had been brought about. The gentleman treated me and the House to a highly rhetorical reply. He said that he would, by way of answering the gentleman from New York as to the specific time, tell him that it was when the courts were silent; it was when they carried on war against the Government; when they became enemies of the Government; when they waged war through long, dreary years; obliterated from their State constitutions every vestige of recognition of our Government; discarded all official oaths, and took in their places oaths to support the government of our enemy; it was when they disregarded all the laws of war, "when they carved the bones of your martyrs into ornaments, and drank from goblets made of their skulls."

Well, sir, that is very rhetorical, and there is a great deal more of it. It is very fervid, very touching, and very effective. But, sir, he will excuse me for saying that it is not an answer to my question. It is simply and solely an evasion of it; and he will excuse me for asking his attention to it again. I take it, that, being a lawyer, he knows very well that the relation of the State to the Federal Government at any time is a question of law, of constitutional law. He will concede that under the law of the Constitution a State, at any particular time, either is or is not a member of the Union. It is very easy to tell when States became members of this Union, and by what specific act. We all know, for example, that the Constitution was adopted on the 17th of September, 1787, and that it went into effect on the 4th of March, 1789. At that time neither North Carolina nor Rhode Island had ratified the Constitution. They were alien States, decided to be such by the Supreme Court of the United States; so that goods that were imported from those States into the United States were taxed by our laws as goods imported from other foreign countries. They were foreign States far more essentially and truly than any one can claim any of the rebel States to have been or to be. And yet on the 21st of November, 1789, North Carolina ratified the Constitution, and thus became, on that day and by that act, a member of the Union; and Rhode Island, on the 29th of May, 1790, more than a year after the Constitution had been adopted by enough States to give it validity, and after the Union was thus formed, became also a member of that Union at that specific time and by that specific act. It is thus very easy to say precisely when and precisely how any State became a member of the Union.

Now, I take it to be equally true that if a State ceases to be a member of the Union she must so cease at some specific time and by some specific act. On any certain day, say the 4th of July, 1861, South Carolina either was or was not a member of the Union, and so of any other day. It is asserted that she is not a member now; and I ask for the specific time when she thus ceased to be a member of the Union. She adopted her ordinance of secession on the 17th of November, 1860. Was she a member on the day before, and had she ceased to be a member on the day after, that act? This is the question I asked; but I got no answer. If she did thus cease, then it was the ordinance of secession that terminated her membership. But I did not understand the gentleman from Ohio to maintain that theory in distinct terms, and I presume he does not hold it.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Do you desire an answer?

Mr. RAYMOND. If I have misstated the gentleman's position, I do; otherwise I do not.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. What was the gentleman's statement? I did not hear it.

Mr. RAYMOND. I do not suppose I have misrepresented the gentleman. I say that on the day before South Carolina passed her ordinance of secession she was a member of the Union by general consent. Now, was she a member the day after she passed it? If she was not, then the moment of its passage was the specific time when she ceased to be a member of the Union. I say I do not understand the gentleman to maintain that position.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I do not maintain that position.

Mr. RAYMOND. Very well; so I supposed. Then I proceed to inquire still further, if it was not that, what was it, that accomplished this result which the gentleman maintains was accomplished by something or other?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will not interrupt the gentleman unless he desires an answer to the question he has just propounded.

Mr. RAYMOND. No, sir, I do not.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Then I will not interrupt him.

Mr. RAYMOND. I am obliged to the gentleman for his forbearance. I ascertain from his admission that he does not hold that the passage of ordinances of secession effected a severance of these States from the United States. I proceed, then, to inquire what was it that did effect it? Was it the fact that they made war? Why, sir, the fact of making war is nothing in itself. They may make war, but that is a game that two can play at, and unless they make successful war, the fact of their making war has no relevancy at all, and can work no change in their constitutional relations. They became members of the Union by their ratification of the Constitution and by the acceptance of that ratification, and they cannot annul either of those acts by the fact of making war. Is it the length of the war, its duration? Would they have been out of the Union if they had made three months' war, or six months' war, or one years' war, or two years' war? If it was the length of the war that accomplished the result, pray what is the length essential to its accomplishment? Was it the mode of making war? Was it the fact that they "carved the bones of our martyred heroes into ornaments" that took them out of the Union? Of course no one will pretend that. If, then, it was neither the fact of their making war, nor the duration of the war, nor the mode in which they carried it on, what is there left but a successful result of the war which could possibly accomplish the object at which they aimed? If the war had been successful, then, and then only, would they have accomplished their purpose of departing from the Union.

Now, I wish to refer for a moment, and I will be very brief, to the prize cases so often quoted to sustain the position that the citizens of the rebel States were enemies during the war, and are vanquished enemies now, in a political sense, for in any other sense it has no relevancy whatever to the questions now at issue. I understood the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. DEMING,] and various other gentlemen who have spoken on this subject, to take the ground that inasmuch as the Supreme Court has decided them to be public enemies, therefore they have no rights under the Constitution of the United States, but are subject to our absolute will and disposal. Now, I wish to repeat what I said when I spoke before, that the point which was decided by the Supreme Court in the prize cases was simply this: that, during the war, for the purposes of the war, to define the mode in which and the law by which the war could and should be carried on, all the inhabitants of the southern States were public enemies, in this, that property belonging to persons living within the enemy's lines might be seized as enemy's property. It was not held that they would continue public enemies after the war closed, or that they were enemies in any political sense whatever.

Now, sir, there is one single sentence, and it is a brief one, in the decision of the Supreme Court which will show that I make that distinction not without warrant. The court distinctly cautions us against falling into the error of supposing that the term "enemy" was used in a political sense, or in the sense of the common law. Justice Grier in his opinion says:

"But in defining the term 'enemy's property,' we will be led into error if we refer to Fleta and Lord Coke for their definition of the word 'enemy.' It is a technical phrase peculiar to prize courts, and depends upon principles of public policy as distinguished from common law."

Now, in every part of that decision this distinction must be borne in mind, else we shall fall into the precise error against which we are warned by the very decision of the court itself. I repeat there is not one sentence, not one word, not one syllable, in that decision which will give the slightest countenance to the idea that the court decided that the people of those States are still enemies, now the war is closed, or that they have ever been political enemies in the sense in which that term is used upon this floor. The object, and the only object of the court was to decide what was the status of property belonging to public enemies, so far as the right of capture was concerned. And the decision on that point was that we had the right to capture property found at sea belonging to men living within the enemies' lines; not because it belonged to disloyal persons, but because it was within reach of the enemy and might be used against us by them in the war. And that is the reason, as I understand it, which controls the whole law upon that technical subject.

I hold in my hand a summary of the decision of the court, prepared by Richard H. Dana, jr., of Boston, who is known there and elsewhere as one of the ablest lawyers, and one of the soundest publicists in that State, which abounds in both. He was counsel in one of these cases, and I may add here, because with some it might give the greater weight to his authority, that he is to-day one of the most strenuous advocates of the adoption of stringent measures in regard to the southern States.

Mr. JULIAN obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the time of my colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] be extended so that he can conclude his remarks.

Mr. RAYMOND. I would be greatly indebted to the House if I may be permitted to conclude what I have to say.

No objection was made.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Dana says on this subject:

"In closing, I offer the following synopsis of what I understand the court did and did not decide."

"What the court did not decide:

"1. The court did not decide that the passing of the ordinances of secession made the territory of the insurgent States enemy's territory, or its inhabitants alien enemies.

"2. The court did not decide that the passing of the secession ordinances terminated, or in any way affected, the legal relations of the insurgent States as bodies-politic with the General Government, or the political relations of their inhabitants with the General Government or with their respective States.

"3. The court decided absolutely nothing as to the effect of the passing of the secession ordinances on the civil or political relations of the inhabitants of the insurgent States with the General Government or with their respective States, or on the relations of the insurgent States, as bodies-politic, with the General Government.

"4. The court did not decide that the inhabitants of the seceding States are alien enemies at all, or that the territory of those States is enemy's territory."

"What the court did decide:

"1. That in case of domestic war the Government of the United States may, at its option, use the powers and rights known to the international laws of war as blockade and capture of enemy's property at sea.

"2. That to determine whether property found at sea is 'enemy's property,' within the meaning of the law of prize, the same tests may be applied in domestic as in international wars.

"3. One of those tests is that the owner of the property so found has his domicile and residence in a place of which the enemy has a certain kind and degree of possession.

"4. Richmond, Virginia, was at the time of the capture and condemnation of those vessels under such possession and control of an organized, hostile, belligerent power, as to render it indisputably 'enemy's territory,' within the strictest definitions known to the laws of war.

"5. That it was immaterial how that organized power came into existence, whether by the use of State machinery or otherwise, or what its political claims or assumptions are, or whether it is composed of rebel citizens, or invading aliens, or both, or whether it professes to recognize State lines. It is enough for the court that it is waging war, and so recognized by the political department of the General Government, and has the requisite possession of the region in which the owner of the property resides.

"6. That a court of prize in such case decides independently of all questions as to the political relations of the owner, or of the place of his domicile, with the Government of the capturing Power."

So much for that point, and I will not dwell further upon it. But I think it shows clearly that the Supreme Court gave no countenance by its decision to the doctrine presented here, that the inhabitants of these States, having once been belligerents, and declared to be enemies within the technical meaning of the law of prize, are to-day political enemies, and thus subject to be disposed of by us under no restraints but our absolute will and pleasure as their conquerors.

Mr. STEVENS. Did not Mr. Dana confine his remarks to the mere effect of passing the ordinance of secession?

Mr. RAYMOND. In other portions of this précis Mr. Dana extends the consideration of the subject generally, and says that the court did not decide at all that these people were political enemies.

It is claimed here that the rebel States have forfeited their rights under the Constitution; and that on the ground of forfeiture they have ceased to have any rights under the Constitution of the United States. As I said the other day, that is a novel doctrine to me. I do not know how States can thus forfeit their rights unless they can discard their obligations also. They certainly cannot do it outside of the Constitution, and there is no provision in the Constitution under which they can do it. They have not done it by the law of nations. We have not been waging a war of conquest against them, and have not achieved any such subjugation as gives us such power or puts them absolutely at our mercy.

As I understand it, we have acquired no greater power over them by our victory over the rebellion than we had before the rebellion broke out. We put down the rebellion, we crushed the usurpation; we expelled or overpowered the usurpers, we cleared the rebel States of all authority and all force that resisted and rendered impossible the execution of the laws of the United States. When that was done we were done, and the States remained as they were before. We certainly did not conquer them in any sense of subjugation to anything else than the Constitution and law of the United States.

Moreover I find in the Constitution no provision for the forfeiture of State rights. I find there no provision for punishing States. I find provision for punishing individuals for treason, but none for punishing States. I made in this connection a remark a few days ago, that the Constitution generally dealt with individuals and not with States; that there were but few cases in which it dealt with States at all.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] in somewhat eager haste, I thought, to avail himself of what he might well enough have supposed to be a mere lapsus on my part in the use of language, paraded before the House an array of about fifty cases in which the Constitution does deal directly with States; and he asserted in broad terms that the "ability to read the English language" ought to have preserved me from making such a mistake as that. Well, sir; I did not take that in ill part at all. It was a part of the gentleman's rhetoric. He had a perfect right to resort to it. It was not the only case in which he did so, though, perhaps, it was the only case in which he did it with so direct a personal application to myself.

But, sir, I repeat, with a full knowledge of the word as I used it then, that so far as inflicting punishment is concerned the Constitution deals with individuals, and not with States. It does deny the right of States to do certain things—to make treaties, issue letters of marque and reprisal, &c.; but it provides no punishment for States if they violate those injunctions, except the simple penalty of rendering null and void everything that they thus do in violation of those prohibitions. I knew, when I made that statement, that I was not originating any new doctrine. I remembered that Daniel Webster, in one of his able and striking replies to Mr. Calhoun, took the same ground—that the Constitution deals mainly with States; and I knew that in that case he quoted from older and perhaps higher authorities, if there could be higher authority than his own upon that or any other point of constitutional law. I remembered that Oliver Ellsworth, in urging upon Connecticut the adoption of the Constitution, declared explicitly that its great peculiarity was that it dealt with individuals and not with States. I remembered that Mr. Samuel Johnson, the famous lawyer of the same State, made substantially the same statement. And I remembered also that Daniel Webster quoted them both when he concurred in their opinion, and said that—

"The Constitution was adopted that there might be a Government which should act directly on individuals without borrowing aid from the State governments."

I thought, sir, that I should not be in very bad company when I propounded so simple a proposition; and I think to-day that if the "ability to read the English language" should have protected me from falling into error, it should have protected them also.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RAYMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The gentleman seems to charge me (though I do not think he intended it) with an intentional misunderstanding of his remarks in regard to the Constitution dealing with States. Now, sir, if I fell into a misapprehension as to his meaning on that point, it was his fault. If I fell into a misapprehension, it was because, in connection with his statement that the Constitution did not deal with States, he said that it did not do it "except in one or two instances, such as elections of members of Congress and the election of electors of President and Vice President," showing that he was not speaking of the Constitution dealing with individuals in the punishment of crime or in the enforcement of laws, but that he was speaking of the Constitution dealing with States in the political sense which I attributed to him, because he instanced those two cases.

Mr. RAYMOND. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that I was less guarded than I might have been in the language which I used; perhaps it was susceptible of a broader interpretation than I meant to give it. When I said that the Constitution deals with individuals rather than States, I meant to confine it, as the connection shows—though perhaps I should have done so more explicitly than I did—to the matter of punishments.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The gentleman, I trust, will pardon me, if I make one additional suggestion. I agree to the proposition which the gentleman states, that, in all matters of the enforcement of the laws under the Constitution of the United States, the Constitution does act on individuals. That has been again and again affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. RAYMOND. That was all, sir, I designed to say on that point.

Now, having shown, it seems to me, by reasoning, with more or less force and conclusiveness, that we have no right to deal with the States lately in rebellion otherwise than as we might have dealt with them before the rebellion began, I wish to show that the action of the departments, executive, legislative, and judicial, confirms that view. That action proceeds from first to last upon the supposition they were States in the Union when the rebellion broke out; that they continued to be States of the Union during the war; and that they are States in the Union now that the war is over and the rebellion crushed. I do not wish to detain the House by referring in detail to the various acts by which I can sustain these views. It is enough when I refer in general terms to the proclamations of the Executive, and his declarations, both public and private. The first inaugural delivered by the President of the United States, Mr. Lincoln, on the 4th of March, 1861, takes the same position, and is predicated upon this position, that all that he had to do was to execute the laws of the Union, not to wage war against a State. He said:

"It follows that no State upon its own mere motion can lawfully get out of the Union; that resolves and ordinances to that effect are legally void; and that acts of violence within any State or States against the authority of the United States are insurrectionary or revolutionary, according to circumstances. I consider, therefore, that in view of the Constitution and laws the Union is unbroken, and to the extent of my ability I shall take care, as the Constitution itself expressly enjoins upon me, that the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the States."

And in the proclamation of April 15, calling out the first body of troops, he declared that—

"Whereas the laws of the United States have been for some time past, and are now, opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings,"— he would call for seventy-five thousand men to suppress those combinations and enable him to execute the laws. This, too, is the tone and teaching of all the diplomatic correspondence of the Government carried on through the Secretary of State. England was warned from the very first that any recognition by her of these States as being out of the Union would be resented as a cause of war; and Mr. Seward said to Mr. Adams that if England recognized the southern States she must prepare to be their ally. So Mr. Lincoln, in his letter to Mr. Greeley, published at the time, adopted the same idea. So in his letter to Fernando Wood of December 12, 1862, he uses these distinct terms:

"Understanding the phrase 'the southern States would send Representatives to Congress' to be substantially the same as that the people of the southern States would cease resistance and would inaugurate, submit to, and maintain the national authority within the limits of such States under the Constitution of the United States, I say that in such case the war would cease on the part of the United States, and that if within a reasonable time a full and general amnesty were necessary, to such end it would not be withheld."

So in every declaration of the President; but I will not keep the House by reading more. The House will excuse me for reading as one more proof a passage from the reply to the French proposal for referring the whole subject to a commission. Mr. Seward in that reply says:

"The Congress of the United States furnishes a constitutional forum for debates between the alienated parties. Senators and Representatives from the loyal portion of the people are there already fully empowered to confer; and seats also are vacant and inviting Senators and Representatives from the discontented party who may be constitutionally sent there from the States involved in the insurrection."

That declaration received the approval of the President, and expressed the views of the executive department of the Government.

Now, so much for the executive department of the Government. I find also upon the statute-book laws of Congress all based upon the same idea; laws imposing direct taxes, frequently referred to in these debates. In August, 1861, that law was passed apportioning their share of direct taxes to each of the States then in rebellion, naming them and recognizing them most distinctly and explicitly as States of the Union; and those taxes were paid, or when paid will be paid, by virtue of that act of Congress. So with the apportionment of representation. The act passed March 4, 1862, which did not take effect by its terms until March 4, 1863, gave to each of the southern States its proportion of representation upon this floor. It thus acknowledged the right of representation in Congress of every one of those States, and by the most solemn action declared them to be States of the Union and in the Union even while in open rebellion and war. I could read from other laws passed during the war and show that they all imply, more or less directly, precisely the same thing. I find moreover from time to time distinct declarations by Congress and by this House of the object and scope of the war; I find that the object of the war is in every instance declared to be to defend and preserve the Union with "all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired." I find that one resolution defining the objects for which and for which alone the war was waged, and specifying as one of them the preservation of the rights of the States unimpaired, passed this House after the war had begun in the summer of 1861; and I find recorded as having voted for it nearly all who were then and who are now members of the House on the Union side, and many others. I find the distinguished gentleman who is now the Speaker of the House, [Mr. COLFAX;] I find the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY;] I find the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] voting that the object of the war was to preserve the rights of the States unimpaired, and that when that object was attained the war should cease.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. RAYMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I desire to say that I stood upon that position and I still stand upon it, and it is in order that the rights of the States may be preserved unimpaired that we have raised the joint committee of fifteen.

Mr. RAYMOND. If I understand the gentleman, he holds that the rights of the States are now not only impaired but destroyed, and that they are not in existence now. Now, as the object of the war was to preserve those rights unimpaired, the war must have failed to accomplish the object for which, by the common consent and positive declarations of Congress, it was carried on. What, then, did it accomplish, if not the object for which it was waged? I hold that the war was not a failure but a success; that it did achieve its declared object; that it suppressed the rebellion, and by so doing "maintained the integrity of the Union and preserved the rights of all the States unimpaired."

Well, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] although I have heard him complimented (and he will excuse me for saying I consider it a very questionable compliment) for having always held that the States were out of the Union, has not, I believe, always held it or always desired that others should, for I find him introducing a resolution in this House on the 4th of December, 1862, declaring—

"That if any person in the employment of the United States, in either the legislative or executive branch, should propose to make peace, or should accept or advise the acceptance of any such proposition on any other basis than the integrity and entire unity of the United States and their Territories as they existed at the time of the rebellion, he will be guilty of a high crime."

I do not propose to be guilty of that "high crime."

And now, with one more authority on this subject, I will drop it; and that shall be the authority of the present Chief Justice of the United States on the question whether the States are in the Union or not. In a discourse which Chief Justice Chase delivered about a year ago at Dartmouth College, he said:

"It is my opinion that the States remain States." * * * "And the rebel governments of the southern States have been destroyed. All the machinery of these governments has come to an end; and now, holding as I do that these States remain States, the second process of reorganization is that the governments now revert into the hands of the southern people. They are to rebuild the governments of these States."

I leave this opinion to speak for itself, and with that I leave the discussion, already too much extended, of this part of the subject.

I have thus endeavored to show—with how much or how little success I leave to the House to judge—that the States lately in rebellion are still States of the Union; that their people are not "vanquished enemies" in any political sense, or in any sense which subjects them to be disposed of according to our political discretion; that they are still within the jurisdiction and protection of the Constitution; that they enjoy all the rights under that Constitution which they had before, that they are bound to perform all the duties which the Constitution devolves upon them; and that we are bound by that Constitution in our dealings with them, and have no right to do anything in regard to them which the Constitution does not permit and empower us to do. We have taken a solemn oath to protect and maintain the Constitution of the United States. By the tenth amendment of that instrument all the rights not conferred upon the General Government are retained by the States or by the people thereof. I submit that it is our duty to fulfill the injunctions of the Constitution in that respect as in any other, and toward those States as toward all others. Whether members may be disposed to concede it as a right or not, or to grant it practically even if they do concede it in theory, we have no right, acting under the solemn obligation of our oaths, to set the Constitution of the United States or its authority aside for a single moment.

Having thus, in a somewhat desultory manner, and I am sure very tediously, discussed this question, I will come to a more practical application of the principles I have endeavored to establish. The contest ended in April or May of last spring. The war, which was to crush the rebellion, restore the integrity of the Union and maintain the rights of the States and Territories as they existed before the rebellion, came to an end, having accomplished its object. The President had carried on the war by virtue of his power as Chief Executive of the United States, and as Commander-in-Chief of its armies and navies. By the constitution, article second, section first, the executive power is vested in the President alone. By the third section of the same article it is declared that he shall take care that the laws are faithfully executed. He carried on the war for that purpose by the power directly conferred upon him by Congress. We often hear it said, in regard to the southern States, that if not out of the Union their practical relations to the Government have been suspended. Now, that is true unquestionably. But what is the precise meaning of that language? In what phrase known to the Constitution can the fact be clothed? Is it anything else than this: that in consequence of their condition the laws of the United States could not be executed within those States, and it was necessary so to change that condition as to render their execution possible?

Well, the war came to an end. The President found this state of things existing: the authority which had opposed the execution of the laws had been destroyed; the usurpation had been expelled; the laws were there; your statute-books were full of laws applicable to all these States; there was no lack of laws; the only lack was of agencies and agents for their execution; the machinery of the government stood still. There was, for example, a law upon your statute-book imposing a tariff of duties on goods imported into southern ports; there was nobody there to collect them. There was a law imposing internal revenue taxes all through those States, and there was no machinery by which they could be collected. There was a law upon your statute-book assigning to those States, by districts, members of Congress; but there were no voters duly qualified under the Constitution of the United States to elect them, and no Legislatures to direct and regulate the manner of their election.

Now, sir, what did the President do under these circumstances? Congress was not in session, and, moreover, it was an executive duty that devolved upon him. He went forward to put the States in a condition to enable him to execute the laws. He proceeded to put the States in such a condition that he could start the machinery of government, so that the laws of the United States might be faithfully executed by him within the limits and jurisdiction of those States.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to ask the gentleman a question merely for information. What law of Congress was the President executing when he ordered conventions in the States and told them what kind of constitutions to frame?

Mr. RAYMOND. I am quite incredulous of the gentleman's statement that he wishes for information. He seldom needs information on this or any other subject. I am quite sure he has as much of it as I have, though he may not take precisely the same view of the legal bearing of the information in his possession as I should take. However, I will endeavor, in due course of time, to give him what little information I have upon that particular point.

As I have said, it was the duty of the President to execute the existing laws. When Congress shall make new laws for him to execute, he will undoubtedly execute them; but these laws were there, in all the plenitude of their sovereign authority; they stood upon the statute-book, and it was for him to execute them. He thought it his duty so to do. There were a variety of ways open to him by which to provide for their execution, of which he has told us in his annual message. He might have done it by the direct exercise of military power, but that would have involved various evils which he has pointed out, and which are acknowledged to be sufficient. He chose to execute them by virtue of his combined and conjoint authority as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and also as the chief Executive of the United States. He followed the precedent set by his predecessor and commenced by him without objection to its fundamental principle on the part of Congress. The first thing he did necessarily was to relieve the great body of the people from their disabilities, so that they could act as loyal and qualified electors of those States; and there is no doubt that he had the power to do this, for it is expressly conferred upon him by the Constitution. There is no doubt, moreover, that it was absolutely necessary as the first step toward the execution of the laws. His predecessor had done the same thing by issuing a proclamation extending amnesty to the people of the southern States upon certain conditions. He thus had a basis for a reorganization of the machinery of Government. He then appointed provisional governors by virtue of his authority as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, under whose direction and guidance, as representatives of the national authority, this process of restoration might proceed.

Now, I know the question has been raised—and perhaps it is not quite clear and free from doubt—as to the precise legal authority he had to take this specific step; but I believe it is a principle well established in law that the war powers do not necessarily cease when the actual operations of the war shall have ended; and that the powers of the Commander-in-Chief extend beyond the time when the hostilities armies in the field are disabled and destroyed. It is a period when war is not raging, but is not yet ended—a period known to lawyers and courts as non flagrante sed nondum cessante bello. And it has been held in the highest English courts and in all the courts where the question has come up, that the Commander-in-Chief may exercise the authority properly belonging to him as Commander-in-Chief even after the actual war is over. President Johnson appointed provisional governors of these States as his agents, not in the form or under the name of military governors, though that would not have changed the nature of their duties, because he himself had the same duties confided to him when made military governor of Tennessee by President Lincoln. But he appointed them as his agents to set in motion the machinery of Government; and a part of that machinery was the calling of conventions and of Legislatures which should act for the States, and aid by necessary legislation in reestablishing the relations of the States with the Federal Government. He prescribed the terms on which citizens should be allowed to vote for members of the Legislature and for delegates to the convention. He did that because he had an undoubted right to see that power was no longer usurped, and that there should be no voting but loyal and legal voting there. So he went on, by one step after another, advising the Legislatures, counseling them to abolish slavery, not only by their own laws, but by adopting the constitutional amendment, recommending them to repudiate the rebel debt, and also to put upon their own constitutional records a solemn abandonment of the doctrine of secession. Without going further into the details of the steps taken by the President, I will merely say that he proceeded steadily and successfully to restore authority in those States, to put in motion the machinery of their governments, and through that machinery to take care, as he was solemnly sworn to do, that the laws of Congress were "faithfully executed."

I do not know that there was any special call for the interposition of Congress upon that subject. In my judgment the proper function of Congress does not come in until a later stage of the proceedings. The decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of the Dorr rebellion in the State of Rhode Island, has been quoted here to show that it was for Congress to decide when a republican form of government, which they are bound to guaranty, does exist in a State. I have not that decision by me at this time. But I think if gentlemen will read it with special regard for its language and especially for the qualifying clauses in it, they will discover that the decision was to this effect: that it was for Congress to decide what was a republican form of government by deciding upon the admission of members coming from that government, or elected under it. This is the mode and scope of the action of Congress upon this point, and having decided it the members thus admitted are members of Congress, and laws in the enactment of which they take part are binding upon all the departments of the Government. As I understand it, that is the extent to which upon that point that decision went.

Now, what is the condition of these States to-day? They are in the full exercise of their functions of self-government. Our laws relating to them exist upon our statute-books, and they are duly executed within their limits. Taxes are collected from the people of those States. The vessels that go into their ports pay duties according to our laws. Not only has self-government been established throughout those States, but they are to-day, whatever may have been the case during the war, now in the Union, and they can only be got out of the Union by expulsion. It is possible that this Congress may attempt to expel them, but I do not think it will. It can declare them not to be in the Union, but it must be by a positive act of deprivation if it actually gets them out from the jurisdiction and protection of the Constitution; and Congress is not empowered to perform any such act.

Now, all that remains to complete the restoration of their practical relations with the national Government is the admission of representatives from those States into the two Houses of Congress; and that is for Congress to do. That is purely, solely, and exclusively confided to the power of Congress. The President has nothing to do with that question. And all that we have now to decide is, upon what principles shall that question be settled? I say with regard to that matter, as I have said in regard to every other question connected with our relations to those States, that we must decide it on the principles of the Constitution. We have no right to go beyond that. The fifth section of the first article of the Constitution says:

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

It is for this House to decide upon the qualifications of members who may present themselves here for admission, and it has the right to select its own test to determine that question of qualification in its own way and by its own forms. It has a right to declare that disloyalty, evinced by active hostility against the United States, shall be a disqualification for a seat on this floor, and it has already done so.

There is another point. As Representatives are chosen by districts and not by States, I maintain that this House is bound to consider the case of each separate district by itself, as a district; by which I mean that if a member presents himself here from a particular district of the State of Georgia we can inquire into his qualifications for occupying a seat upon this floor without regard to the character of other Representatives from that State, or of the State itself. If he is a disloyal man we can exclude him, and decide that his district, having sent here a disqualified man as a Representative, is not entitled to representation until it sends one who is qualified; and if the adjoining district sends a man who is qualified, we may and should admit him, thus deciding the matter by districts and not by States. The Senate, of course, will act for itself on the question of admitting Senators, and must, of necessity, act by States.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will pardon me for interrupting him, but I would like to understand from him whether he holds that this House can make a law changing the qualifications which the Constitution prescribes for a member of Congress, or whether he holds that it must be done by both branches of Congress jointly.

Mr. RAYMOND. I do not think that either this House or both branches of Congress can change the provisions of the Constitution in that respect or in any other.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire the gentleman to state whether, in his view, we can, either by our own action or the joint action of both Houses, make a law requiring other qualifications for membership than those designated in the Constitution.

Mr. RAYMOND. We cannot pass any law whatever except by the joint action of the two Houses, and we cannot by joint action pass any valid law which shall contravene the provisions of the Constitution; but so far as concerns the admission of members to this floor, we ourselves are the absolute judges. "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." There is the source from which we get authority to judge at all, and that expressly assigns authority on this subject to each House. In acting on this subject, we must undoubtedly abide by the Constitution, and must demand that any person claiming a seat as a Representative shall satisfy the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, a test oath, being an addition to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution, can lawfully be required of persons presenting themselves for admission as Representatives.

Mr. RAYMOND. I think that we can add such an oath as a test of qualification, if we choose. The Constitution does not prohibit us from requiring any additional test of qualification which we may deem essential.

Now, sir, it is said that by the course of procedure which I suggest a State may be represented partially in one House and not at all in the other. Well, sir, why not? If a particular district in a certain State is entitled to representation by virtue of its loyalty, and it sends here a loyal man as its Representative, that man should be admitted, even though all the rest of the State should be disloyal, and thus disqualified from sending a proper man as a representative in the other branch of Congress. I see no objection to that in point of constitutional law, and I see some advantages in point of policy. This, it occurs to me, the only way in which we can have any representation of the loyal men of the southern States, or do them any kind of justice. We should not judge them sweepingly, classing them with rebels and traitors, and declaring that because some in the State are not entitled to representation, none can have it. Moreover, it would give us some relief and promise us more in future from the great evil which has afflicted the politics of this country for some years past—I mean the evil of sectionalism. We can form relations with loyal men in portions of the South. They need not come here in solid phalanx, adhering, as a matter of course or necessity, to one political party, and to one line of national policy, and taking no part in the general interests of the country, except so far as their relations to one particular party incline them to do so.

Now, sir, it is objected that it is unsafe to admit upon this floor members from the States whose people were lately engaged in rebellion, because those members may vote in a way to destroy or impair some of the permanent interests of the country, or in a way which conflicts with the opinions which many of us hold to be the only safe opinions on which the Government can be conducted. Well, sir, if they are loyal men, (and I do not wish to meet any other here,) they will not vote in a disloyal manner. But, sir, I do not see what right we have to make any point like that. We have no right to canvass how men shall vote before we admit them to seats upon this floor. If they have the right at all, they hold it wholly independent of that consideration. Moreover, I venture to say we need to-day more than we need anything else, Representatives, intelligent Representatives, loyal Representatives from the southern States here upon this floor, for our own information and guidance on subjects we are daily called upon to canvass and decide.

Why, sir, that is the mode by which, in the view of the Constitution, Congress should be become enlightened as to the action it should take. It is to act upon information furnished by Representatives from the different States. Look at the means we have to resort to now, for lack of such representation, to procure such information. We have to rely upon newspaper reports, upon chance letters of correspondents. We hear read before Congress, in one branch or the other, copious extracts from anonymous letters. We call to our aid agents sent South, as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. DEMING] said, to inspect the "southern animus." This is a roundabout and most unsatisfactory way of procuring information to serve as a basis of public action. Each agent will bring from there what he takes there; he will see what he went to see—that and nothing more. Is information thus loosely gathered from irresponsible sources a proper guide for legislation? Is that proper ground on which to act? We should gain immensely in knowledge of the actual condition of the States if we had by our side loyal, intelligent southern men representing loyal districts in the southern States.

Now, sir, we have not gone to work to decide upon the admission of members in this way. We have not taken this constitutional mode of considering the claims of southern Representatives to seats on this floor. Instead of acting in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, instead of acting ourselves at all, we have abdicated that high function and handed it over to a joint committee of fifteen—a committee which sits with closed doors, which deliberates in secret, which shuts itself out from the knowledge and observation of Congress, and which does not even deign to give us the information it was appointed to collect, and on which we are to base our action—but which sends its rescripts into this House and demands their ratification, without reasons and without facts, before the going down of the sun! Is that the constitutional mode of acting on this great question? Is it a mode which can satisfy the consciences and patriotic convictions of any man on this floor?

This resolution embodies an amendment to the Constitution which comes from that committee. It is sent here, and the prompt, instant action of the House is demanded upon it. Not a reason came to us from the committee for its adoption, not a statement even of any exigency which required it. I rejoice that the sense of the House revolted from the monstrous outrage of deciding so great a question, one touching so nearly the fundamental principles of our Government, on so small a basis. It demanded debate; and I shall be much disappointed if from the able debates of the past few days the House has not received information and criticism of value in aiding it to form just opinions and take proper action upon the subject.

I think, sir, we have a right to ask that committee for the entire programme on which they propose to reconstruct the Government of the United States before we adopt any of its parts. We may have this amendment changing the basis of representation sent to us to-day, and to-morrow we may have another virtually consolidating the national Government and substantially extinguishing the rights which belong to the States under the Constitution. I will not assume that this is the direction in which the committee is looking for the reconstruction of the Government, but we are entitled to know definitely and distinctly what it does propose, and all that it proposes, before we act at all. When we grope in the dark we know not what we meet, and when we abdicate our own functions and power and put them into the hands of a committee, a creature of our own, which shuts its doors against us, and deliberates in secret and only issues from time to time decrees for us to ratify or reject, it is our right, nay, sir, it is our duty to apprehend the worst, and to demand all the guarantees that full information can furnish for the safety of the trust we have committed to its hands.

I think we owe it to ourselves here upon this floor to emancipate ourselves from the domination of that committee. I think we owe it to ourselves here to discharge that committee from the further consideration of certain subjects we have assigned it, and take them where the Constitution has placed them, into our own keeping. Whether the House is prepared for such action, I do not know. I think for its own dignity it should become so as soon as possible.

We are told that we must admit none to the exercise of political power who are not sincere in their loyalty. Now, I have on that point this to submit: we have no means, in the first place, of testing the sincerity and loyalty of any man except by his public acts. What, moreover, have we to do with the motives of men North or South, or their opinions upon politics or anything else? I thought the day had gone by when opinions could be coerced by political power, or when Governments took cognizance of opinions at all, apart from public action. I thought that habit had expired when the Inquisition died. We have the right to exact at the hands of every man loyalty in his public action; and that is all we have the right to exact. You have the right to hold whatever opinions you like in regard to the Government if you will obey its laws and act with due allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States. That every man may be compelled to yield. What he may do is our concern; what he may believe or think is his, and his alone.

We have heard a great deal of the necessity of requiring irreversible guarantees from the southern States before we can restore them to political power. It is claimed we must have nothing less than an amendment to the Constitution on every point we may deem essential to the public good; and that to these amendments the southern States must consent as a condition precedent to readmission to the Union. On that point I wish to say that I believe we are seriously misled by reliance upon such amendments as guarantees for the future on any subject of vital importance. Take, for instance, the one which guarantees the non-assumption of the rebel debt and the non-repudiation of the national debt. That has been sent out by this House to the country as an amendment to the Constitution, and it is supposed that when it is ratified by the requisite number of States, the payment of our debt is perfectly and permanently secured. Now, sir, I do not believe that either with or without an amendment to the Constitution there is the slightest danger that one dollar of the rebel debt will ever be paid. It is not generally supposed that the people of the South have ever been over zealous touching the payment of their debts, and I see no reason to believe that the war has so increased their resources or their zeal in this behalf as need stir the patriotic apprehensions of Congress.

Now, sir, in regard to our own debt, suppose you put into the Constitution as an amendment a declaration, as broad as you like, and ratify it as often as you like, that this debt shall never be repudiated. Will that declaration pay it? You are to pay it, principal and interest, by voting taxes and in no other way; and when the tax bill is brought into the House, what man will be constrained in the least, as to the vote he will give upon it, by that particular clause of the Constitution of the United States? And if there are any here or elsewhere, or if there shall be in any future time, men on this floor who wish to avoid the obligation to pay the debt, either principal or interest, they will do it by voting not to levy the taxes that are absolutely requisite to its payment. And you cannot coerce the vote of a single man on that question, by a constitutional amendment.

So, too, in regard to the right of secession. Suppose we put an amendment against that doctrine into the Constitution. The States North and South ratify it unanimously; if you please. It will be effectual so long as nobody wants to secede. When they do want to secede, they will override that prohibition just as they will override all the rest of the Constitution. There is nothing like a guarantee, nothing like security in it. Secession will always be, as it always has been, a question of will and of power. The Constitution cannot constrain the will, and if the power is there with the will, matters little what the Constitution contains.

Mr. Speaker, we must bring ourselves to look upon this matter precisely as it is. We must not be deluded by words nor misled as to the one true and sole reliance for the payment of our debt, for the preservation of our Union, for the attainment of all the great objects which this nation was intended to accomplish, and which, we trust, it will yet achieve. We have just one thing and only one to rely on for them all. It is the same which has carried us through this long and arduous war. It is the patriotism of the people of the United States. It is their determination to maintain in the future, as they have maintained in the past, the integrity and the honor of their country. If they have it, and have enough of it to meet the emergencies as they arise, we shall go safely through. If they have it not, all the paper constitutions on the face of the earth could never either give it to them or supply its place.

So, sir, I put no great faith in these so-called guarantees of the Constitution for objects which can only rest upon the public conscience and the public will. They divert our attention from the real nature of the task we have to perform, and lead us to rely on other agencies than those which alone can give us aid. We must still put faith in the people and in all the people. We must remember that public interest is after all the only guide of public conduct, and must learn that we best consult the safety and welfare of the nation when we promote the welfare and the prosperity of all its parts. We must cease to regard the people of the southern States as public enemies, and look upon them and treat them as identified necessarily with us in the fate and fortunes of this great Republic. It may be hard for us thus to recognize so soon as friends the men who have been in arms against us; but if we are to have any safety for the future, unless we are willing to convert our own Government into a despotism, and to perpetuate mutual hatred among its members for years, for generations to come, we must acknowledge the fact that the southern States are, and will remain forever, so long as the Union endures, essentially parts of our common country.

I have heard it said here that we are to hold these States as provincial dependencies. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] in the case he supposed, in case they should never give evidence of what he styles a sincere loyalty, avowed his willingness to hold them as provinces and dependencies forever! Has the gentleman seriously thought of the meaning which his words imply? Ten million people held by a republican Government, itself based on the principle that the only just foundation of government is the consent of the governed, as dependencies forever! Why, sir, there has been no such outrage perpetrated or contemplated for a thousand years in the history of nations. We are to send there agents to collect our taxes, and they must be collected at the point of the bayonet. We send there judges to hold courts, and armies to keep the people in subjection. I commend to the gentleman, and to every one who sympathizes in his views, to read in the Declaration of Independence the causes which were held then, and which will be held always and everywhere, to justify rebellion. They are precisely the things which must go with the policy covered by that proposition. I am not willing, by any such conduct, to sanctify the rebellion we have crushed. If we are to treat them hereafter in that way, we shall simply justify the course they have taken.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. RAYMOND. I suppose I must, as I involve myself in that necessity whenever I allude to the gentleman at all.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. There is no must about it; the gentleman has misapprehended me.

Mr. RAYMOND. I yield, sir.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The gentleman has left out of my statement an extremely important part of it, and it was only in order to get that part in that I desired to suggest it. The part he left out is the word "general." What I said was this: that in the case supposed, if there was not general and sincere loyalty (of course sincerity is to be judged by the main facts) then I would hold them as dependencies forever. I would now like the gentleman to favor me and this House by saying what he will do with them if they remain generally and sincerely disloyal.

Mr. RAYMOND. Well, sir, I do not admit the probability of it any more than he does, and even then I would not convert them into our slaves and subjects, because we should do ourselves tenfold more harm than we should them. There is no calamity which can overtake this Government so great as to infuse into its conduct despotic ideas, for ultimately those ideas will rule its action, and it will depend wholly on the accidents of political power on which section of the Union that despotism will take effect. It may take effect to-day on the southern States, but some party may, at some future time, come into power which will give
